
The basin-wide assessment is an important one. In considering natural systems, political boundaries or other artificial distinctions drawn by policy makers generally confuse the issue.

So when the Delaware River Basin Commission divides the valley into sections and designates them by Roman numerals, we ought to be wary. We ought to demand a halt, likewise, to any decisions which compartmentalize a living, changing river.

Congress now has before it different versions of bills which offer protection to areas of the Delaware under the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act. One is backed by the Save the Delaware Coalition, and another has the backing of the DRBC. The two measures protect different stretches of the river. The one favored by the citizens' groups, sponsored primarily by Bucks Cong. Peter Kostmayer, would preserve 114 miles of the Delaware, as far downstream as the Water Gap.

The other, which was endorsed last week by the DRBC, would end its protection 39 miles upstream from the Gap, and just upstream from the area that would be affected by a Tocks Dam project.

The Kostmayer version's supporters say preservation of the Tocks area is only incidental to the intent of the Wild and Scenic Act. In fact, they admit, the Congress still can do what it wants in the future. The land still will be there, the river still is there, and if it becomes clear 50 years from now that a huge dam is needed, it still could be built.

What cannot be gambled with now is the further loss of riverbank land to private use and development. The Wild and Scenic Act is a powerful tool against this acre-by-acre erosion.

Mechanics of the House Interior Committee call for an omnibus Wild and Scenic River Bill to be reported out very shortly. In it will be sections for several rivers around the country. One to be included is the upper Delaware River, from Hancock, N.Y. to the Port Jervis area, and some kind of compromise on the next section—to the Water Gap, or to somewhere upstream.

The Delaware River deserves no halfway measures. The Water Gap is truly a natural wonder, and recreation and scenic opportunities abound for miles downstream, through Northampton and Bucks Counties.

A 1976 Pennsylvania measure recommending waterways for Wild and Scenic Designation added about 60 miles to the 114 proposed by Kostmayer—all the way to Yardley. The Bucks County stretch may not be wild, but it is scenic. Future legislation would do well to add it to the current proposals.●

THIRTEENTH QUARTERLY REPORT OF THE COUNCIL ON WAGE AND PRICE STABILITY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with Section 5 of the Council on Wage and Price Stability Act, as amended, I hereby transmit to the Congress the thirteenth quarterly report of the Council on Wage and Price Stability. This report contains a description of the Council's activities during the fourth quarter of 1977 in monitoring both prices and wages in the private sector and various Federal government activities that may lead to higher costs and prices without creating commensurate benefits. It discusses Council reports, analyses, and filings before Federal regulatory agencies.

In August 1977 I asked the Council to undertake an in-depth study of the Nation's steel industry. The study was released in October and served as an important information base in the Administration's development of its reference price system for imports of foreign steel.

During the fourth quarter, the Council also issued, among other things, reports on interest rates and inflation, the lumber industry, 1978 model year auto prices, and a detailed analysis of the communication workers' settlement.

The Council on Wage and Price Stability will continue to play an important role in supplementing fiscal and monetary policies by calling public attention to wage and price developments or actions by the government that could be of concern to American consumers.

THE FARM BILL: AN ALTERNATIVE

(Mr. WEAVER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker I am in complete sympathy with my colleagues on the Agriculture Committee in their efforts to keep farmers in the business of feeding our Nation and providing valuable exports and I respect their support of the farm bill before us.

That bill, however, will not be enacted into law and if it were, would be unworkable. There is an alternative.

This alternative, a grain reserve and bargaining agency for overseas grain sales, will do more to solve the fundamental farm situation while benefiting consumers with stable prices and a secure food supply. The costs to the Treasury are practically none.

We approved and enacted as part of last year's farm bill the Humphrey-Weaver grain reserve, now called by the administration the cornerstone of American farm policy. It is already working. Over 250 million bushels of grain have been placed in it by farmers, grain prices have risen, and if the grain reserve is strengthened—by reducing costs of storage to the farmers who are, after all, benefiting the Nation by storing their grain—it will continue to work and improve the lot of American agriculture.

If we now couple this grain reserve with a bargaining agency for grain export sales, we can make long-term sales to other nations at much higher prices. A bushel for a barrel should be our goal.

I will be offering a bargaining agency amendment to an export market bill now in the Agriculture Committee. I propose you vote "No" on the farm bill conference report, and help enact the bargaining agency amendment.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 11291, AUTHORIZING APPROPRIATIONS FOR FEDERAL FIRE PREVENTION AND CONTROL ACT OF 1974

Mr. MOAKLEY from the Committee on Rules submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 95–1046) on the resolution (H. Res. 1118) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 11291) to authorize appropriations for the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974, and to change the name of the National Fire Prevention and Control Administration to the U.S. Fire Administration, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

EV DIRKSEN'S SOUND WARNING ON PANAMA

(Mr. RUDD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Senate has most unfortunately rejected a good proposal to allow this body the opportunity to fulfill its constitutional duty to approve disposal of U.S. property in Panama as a prerequisite for approval of the new Panama Canal Treaty.

As the Senate moves toward its own final vote on this treaty to cede the canal and zone to Panama, I hope that all Members of the other body will remember and consider the somber warning of a great and revered American—the late Senator Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois.

Speaking on the floor of the U.S. Senate in 1964, when Panamanian students were trying to intimidate the United States into withdrawal through rioting, the respected Senator Dirksen stated:

We are in the amazing position of having a country with one-third the population of Chicago kick us around. If we crumble in Panama, the reverberations of our actions will be felt around the world.

Mr. Speaker, Senator Dirksen's great insight is as valid today as it was when that statement was made.

NEW YORK TIMES OPPOSES LIFTING OF TURKISH ARMS EMBARGO WITHOUT ACTION ON CYPRUS SETTLEMENT

(Mr. BRADEMAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I insert at this point in the RECORD the text of two excellent editorials from the New York Times of March 31 and April 9, 1978, urging that Congress not remove the arms embargo against Turkey without appropriate action to settle the Cyprus question.

The articles follow:

TAKING A CHANCE ON TURKEY

Secretary of State Vance told Congress last Thursday that if only it would lift its restrictions on shipments of American arms to Turkey, the Turks and Turkish Cypriots would put forward new proposals for a Cyprus settlement. He may be right. But the issue is not whether there will be new proposals. Rather, it is whether the proposals will move Turkish troops back from the 40 percent of Cyprus they now occupy to a zone more nearly proportional to the 18 percent of the island's population that is Turkish. Secretary Vance is thus asking Congress to join him in betting that once the American restrictions are removed, the Turkish Government of Prime Minister Eceyit will be able to make large concessions that could not be made while the limits remain.

The bet may be a bad one. In Turkey's politics, no time is a good time for conceding territory to Greek Cypriots. And Mr. Ecevit's position seems less strong now than it did when he returned to office last Jan. 1. In Parliament he has been able to govern without the votes of ultranationalists. But in the streets extremists continue their campaigns of violent intimidation that have taken more than 100 lives this year. There is no reason to think that Mr. Ecevit himself does not want to be generous so as to remove the Cyprus problem from his crowded agenda. But in the prevailing political climate, concessions that are even remotely acceptable to the Greek Cypriots may be impossible. And once American pressure is removed, Mr. Ecevit will have even less reason to take political risks.

Secretary Vance emphasized the strains that the limits on arms shipments impose on Turkish politics and Turkey's links to NATO. But he glossed over the comparable strains on Greek politics, and Greece's links to NATO, if removal of the restrictions is not accompanied by a satisfactory outcome on Cyprus. Greece is no less important to NATO's southern flank than Turkey. Any bargain that "saves" Turkey for the alliance at the cost of losing Greece would be hollow indeed. And if, as is likely, Congress should refuse to ease the limits on Turkey, the Administration's present approach risks alienating both countries.

Turkey's spokesmen decry what they see as an American tilt toward Greece, and they say that they only want Americans to be "even-handed." Yet in the present Cyprus situation, removing the arms limits would amount to a tilt toward Turkey. So long as Ankara's troops remain where they are on the island, Congress should retain the only leverage it has.

THE WAY BACK FROM CYPRUS

Since 1974, when Turkish troops, using American weapons, occupied two-fifths of the island of Cyprus, relations between Ankara and Washington have been sour. Congress has limited the flow of additional arms until Turkey pulled back its forces; successive Turkish Governments have refused to to define their conditions for withdrawal under such pressure. Both the United States and Turkey will end up losers if no way can be found to break out of this bind. Turkey could point the way by revealing its proposals for a Cyprus settlement.

Turkey's invasion was scarcely unprovoked. The 18 percent Turkish minority on Cyprus had never been well treated by the Greek majority. And in July 1974, a coup brought to power a hardline Greek-Cypriot faction that seemed likely to take even less account of Turkish-Cypriot rights, Although the insurgent regime lasted only a few days, that was long enough to precipitate Ankara's invasion.

Ankara has reacted to the limit on arms sales—$175 million this year—by sharply restricting American use of NATO facilities in Turkey. Under steady pressure from Greek-Americans, Congress has remained firm. But the Ford Administration strongly deplored the Congressional restrictions as harmful to NATO—and thus caused the Greek Government to curtail its miliitary cooperation with NATO. The Carter Administration has tried to straddle the issue. It has continued discussions for a defense agreement that would substantially increase American military aid to Turkey. But it has implied that it would not conclude the agreement until there had been progress on Cyprus. Early this month, Secretary of State Vance was explicit: Washington would not move, he told Congress, until it had examined proposals for Cyprus promised by Turkey's new Prime Minister, Bulent Ecevit.

More intolerable "linkage," responded Mr. Ecevit—and this time from the Administration, not merely from Congress. He countered with reverse linkage: no Cyprus proposals until the heat is off. That message, and subsequent hints that Turkey might withdraw its half-million men from NATO's command and even sign a nonaggression pact with Moscow, caused a high-level American delegation to hurry to Ankara this week to attempt to set things right.

That won't be easy. Strong sentiment continues in Congress that Turkish concessions are necessary before normal military relations can resume. That sentiment is justified. Turkey broke United States law and violated the spirit of its alliance when it used American weapons to expel Greek Cypriots from their homes and farms. Having made its point. Ankara should now pull back. Greek Cypriots—and Greece—realize there can be no return to the old arrangements on Cyprus. They acknowledge that Turkish Cypriots should enjoy nearly complete autonomy, including a territorial zone of their own, but one proportionate to the size of the Turkish-Cypriot population.

There is every reason to believe that both Prime Minister Ecevit and the Turkish military leadership would like to pull back. Because the Turkish occupation force is the central issue in contention, the first moves must come from Ankara. Since the issue continues to be the most explosive one in Turkey's politics, such a move would be painful. But Mr. Ecevit is in a strong parliamentary position; unlike his predecessor, he does not depend upon ultranationalists for his majority.

Turkish dissociation from NATO would be costly to the United States. But it is the Turks who should calculate the benefits of full participation in NATO; it is they who face the risks of weakened ties to the West. Meanwhile, those who would support NATO by lifting the restrictions on arms to Turkey should remember that Cyprus is just as emotion-wrenching an issue in Greece. It would not strengthen the alliance to appease Turkey at the expense of turmoil in Greece.●

HOUSE SHOULD REJECT FARM CONFERENCE REPORT

(Mr. FINDLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, over the years the House Committee on Agriculture has done some strange things, but I think this week has set a new record of sorts.

On Wednesday this body is being asked to pass judgment on a multibillion-dollar farm bill conference report concerning which not one witness has been called before a committee of this body. No hearings have been held. On those facts alone my colleagues should reject the conference report.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BRADEMAS). Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3(b) of rule XXVII, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on which each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

After all motions to suspend the rules have been entertained and debated and after those motions to be determined by "nonrecord" votes have been disposed of, the Chair will then put the question on each motion on which the further proceedings were postponed.

MARINE MAMMAL PROTECTION ACT AUTHORIZATIONS

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 10730) to authorize appropriations to carry out the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972 during fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981, as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. RUPPE) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10730 would authorize appropriations through fiscal year 1981 to carry out the Marine Mammal Protection Act. This legislation will insure that the United States continues to lead the world in the conservation of marine mammals.

As this body well knows, the Marine Mammal Protection Act has not been implemented without controversy. Last year, the entire American tuna fleet refused to fish for several months in protest against regulations promulgated under the act. Eventually, the fishermen did return to the sea to demonstrate what no one in Washington would believe—they do care about the dolphin populations in the Eastern Pacific Ocean. Last year, the fleet took a fraction of the number of dolphins captured in previous years. They are now releasing unharmed 99.7 percent of all the animals surrounded in the tuna nets. Only one dolphin is taken for every 4 tons of yellowfin tuna landed.

I believe that all of us can be especially proud of the performance of the American tuna fleet. We can also be pleased with the efforts of the Department of Commerce under the Marine Mammal Protection Act. The Commerce Department worked with the tuna fishermen, and together they developed a net which retains the tuna catch while allowing the dolphins to escape.

I do not believe that the tuna-dolphin controversy will be the last fishery-marine mammal conflict. Nevertheless, I am hopeful that we can work through the Marine Mammal Act to solve these conflicts when they do occur. The funding levels provided in H.R. 10730 will insure that the Departments of Commerce and Interior have the capability to respond to both the needs of marine mammals and those of our fishermen.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the very distinguished chairman of the subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment, the gentleman from California (Mr. LEGGETT).

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10730. This legislation authorizes appropriations to the Departments of Interior and Commerce, and the Marine Mammal Commission to carry out their responsibilities under the Marine Mammal Protection Act. H.R. 10730 would authorize a total of $13.7 million in fiscal year 1979; $14.885 million in fiscal year 1980; and $16.6 million in fiscal year 1981. The authorization level for fiscal year 1979 is $4.5 million above the amount requested by the administration, but it does represent the committee's best judgment of the true needs of the marine mammal program.

The increase over the administration request is due primarily to added funding for significant research projects and additional support for States that have resumed management of marine mammals. The committee discovered, in the course of reviewing the act, that insufficient attention has been paid to those States that have resumed management of marine mammals under the standards provided in the act. In passing the act, Congress clearly intended that these States would receive some financial help. To date, they have not.

The authorization level provided in H.R. 10730 would fund a number of important research programs that would not receive funding under the administration request. The most important of these programs involves research on marine mammal species taken incidental to commercial fishing operations within our 200-mile fishery zone. Foreign fishing vessels operating within our 200-mile zone are taking a large number of marine mammal species incident to their fishing operations. The Japanese alone are estimated to take 10,000 to 20,000 porpoise in the North Pacific each year. The Marine Mammal Act requires that these countries obtain a permit to take these species, but before a permit can be granted the Secretary of Commerce must find that the taking will not disadvantage the species. In short, we have not been able to grant these marine mammal permits because we have not done the necessary research to determine the impact of the fishing operations on the mammal populations.

Another major research program that has been totally ignored by the administration involves marine mammals in the Antarctic Ocean. With the pending negotiation of a treaty for the conservation of the living marine resources of the Antarctic, it is critical that the United States expand its research efforts on the population status of these species. Several nations are on the verge of developing the krill resources of the Antarctic Ocean. Unless we develop baseline data on the Antarctic Ocean's resources soon, we may not be able to prevent the obliteration of several mammal species before it is too late.

The Marine Mammal Protection Act has caused us some problems. Nevertheless, I think we can be proud of the conscientious efforts under the act to resolve the major controversies as they have arisen. This legislation will insure that we have a continuing capability to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the prompt passage of H.R. 10730.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10730 which extends the authorization for the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972 for an additional 3 years. This act recognizes that marine mammals are a unique part of the marine ecosystem. In passing the act, Congress acknowledged that existing knowledge of the biology and ecology of marine mammals is inadequate to provide a sound basis for management decisions affecting their conservation and protection.

The extensive research program conducted pursuant to this act since 1972 has provided a basis for a significant record of accomplishment. The most publicized achievement under the act has been the reduction of porpoise mortality incidental to commercial tuna operations. The development of porpoise-saving nets and an increased knowledge of porpoise behavior in the nets has led to a 90-percent reduction in the number of porpoises killed each year.

Other major accomplishments of the Marine Mammal Protection Act include:

The establishment of a joint U.S.-U.S.S.R. marine mammal research program on polar bears;

Research which led to the listing of the Hawaiian monk seal as an endangered species;

Research on the population status of the great whales, which led to a substantial reduction in the international harvest of these magnificent creatures; and

The development of humane care and maintenance standards for marine mammals held in captivity.

H.R. 10730 by extending the authorization of the Marine Mammal Protection Act, will allow a continuation of this important work.

In addition, H.R. 10730 will provide funds for the establishment of an international scientific observer program for the purpose of reducing the number of porpoises killed incidental to the commercial tuna fishing operations of foreign nations. The legislation also provides funding for critical research on the impact of foreign fishing activities on those species of marine mammals found within 200 miles of the U.S. coast. The Marine Mammal Commission has estimated that, prior to passage of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, approximately 10,000 to 20,000 dall porpoises were taken incidental to Japanese fishing operations in the northern Pacific. Moneys provided under H.R. 10730 will enable the Secretary of Commerce to assess the impact of this activity on the dall porpoise. Funds authorized under H.R. 10730 will also enable the Secretary to carry out a research and management program on the Guadelupe fur seal whose population level is so low that it was once thought to be extinct.

Mr. Speaker, the impact of man's activities on terrestrial species of fish and wildlife has long been documented. Comparatively speaking, man has just begun to exploit the resources of the ocean. If we are to prevent marine mammals from suffering the same fate as befell terrestrial species during the era of development, it is critical that the programs funded through the Marine Mammal Protection Act be continued. It is for this reason that I urge the adoption of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FORSYTHE), the distinguished ranking member of the subcommittee.

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this critically important legislation. The Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972 was enacted for the purpose of insuring that those marine mammals found within the waters subject to the jurisdiction of the United States do not fall below their optimum sustainable population. In passing this legislation, Congress responded to the growing concern about man's impact on marine mammals such as whales, dolphins, seals, sea otters, polar bears, and manatees.

Since the passage of the act, the Department of the Interior and the Department of Commerce, which are charged with the responsibility for carrying out the act, have engaged in a wide variety of research and management activities. These programs have been instrumental in reducing the number of porpoises killed incidental to commercial tuna fishing operations. When this act was passed, over 300,000 porpoises per year were being drowned in tuna nets. Today, because of the aggressive efforts of the U.S. tuna fleet and the research conducted under this act, the incidental taking of porpoises was reduced to just over 24,000 in 1977.

In addition to this important achievement, the Marine Mammal Protection Act has provided a framework for the conduct of research on the population status of whales which are commercially harvested by other nations. This research effort has provided essential biological data which has enabled the United States to argue successfully before the International Whaling Commission for a substantial reduction in the number of whales which may be harvested each year.

The basic research conducted pursuant to the Marine Mammal Protection Act has also provided this Nation with the foundation for assessing the impact of man's ocean activities on marine mammals. With an increased emphasis on the development of ocean-related resources and with the increased pollution of the world's oceans, it is critical that this data be developed and evaluated.

H.R. 10730 provides the necessary funds for the continuation of these programs. In addition, H.R. 10730 authorizes the expenditure of additional moneys which will be utilized for conducting research on the many species of great whales, notably the humpback, the bryde's, the fin and the sperm whale, which are found along the east coast of the United States. Little is known about the migration patterns of these species and without that critical baseline biological data we will be unable to adequately assess the impact of activities such as oil exploration and ocean dumping on these whale populations. H.R. 10730 provides similar funds for research on the bottlenose dolphin, marine mammal strandings, and several species of whales and seals which are of great significance to the United States and Mexico.

Finally, H.R. 10730 authorizes funds for the Marine Mammal Commission. This agency, which is vested with responsbility for advising both Secretaries on the implementation of the act and for conducting certain research activities, has an outstanding record of accomplishment. The Commission has been in the forefront of marine mammal conservation efforts, and I think it can be fairly said that without the Commission's leadership and initiative many of the accomplishments of the Marine Mammal Protection Act would not be a reality.

Mr. Speaker, the Marine Mammal Protection Act of 1972 has placed a new emphasis on the conservation of marine mammals. We have been richly rewarded by the achievements made possible because of this act and to continue this work, I urge that H.R. 10730 be adopted.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my support for these increased authorizations in pursuance of the Marine Mammal Protection Act. As a number of Members are aware, recently I traveled to northern Newfoundland to witness the annual slaughter of baby harp seals. The seal slaughter is a highly emotional issue, which raises tempers on both sides of the debate. My traveling companion, Congressman LEO RYAN, and I were the first U.S. officials to receive a first-hand view of the event.

Before getting into the details of this trip, I would like to invite Members to join Congressman RYAN and myself in a special order concerning the seal slaughter, as well as other marine mammal issues next Tuesday, April 17.

I made the trip in my capacity as chairman of the Environmental Study Conference in the House. The ESC consists of 230 Congressmen and 70 Senators, and we attempt to provide objective reliable information on environmental and energy issues to our Members.

Although this is primarily a Canadian issue, the U.S. Congress has, in the past, adopted legislation relating to the seal slaughter. Last year, a resolution was passed by Congress condemning the slaughter. Also, the Marine Mammal Protection Act prevents the importation of seal skins to this country.

Our country has been soundly criticized in the past, by the Canadian Government and the Canadian press for taking positions on the issue without obtaining first-hand information about it. In light of that, it seemed appropriate that in my role as Environmental Study Conference chairman, I should obtain first-hand information, and report back to my colleagues in Congress. My initial invitation came from the Greenpeace Foundation, a Canadian environmental group which opposes the slaughter. However, I did not agree to go until I also secured an invitation from the Canadian Government, which of course, supports the killing of the seals.

I am presently seeking some additional information from the Canadian Government, and when I receive it, I will be reporting on the issue to my colleagues in Congress. But in the meantime, I would like to convey to you some of my observations and impressions.

Beyond the extreme emotionalism of the debate, the basic question to be resolved is one of herd management. There is conflicting evidence on this. The Canadian Government maintains that with its current quota of 180,000 seals taken, the survival of the species is not threatened. But contrary evidence is provided by a number of very reliable sources, including the World Wildlife Fund and the International Union for the Conservation of Nature. These organizations maintain that the quota is at least 20 percent too high, and that survival of the species is indeed threatened.

The other issue, which is far more emotional, is the method of herd management. The event is not a hunt, in the sense that we in Vermont think of hunting. There is no sport. The seals which are taken are newborn, generally about a day old. They cannot move away, or defend themselves in any way. They are simply clubbed to death, by the thousands. Adding to the emotionalism is the fact that the baby seals are adorable, cuddly creatures with big eyes. One's impulse is to pick them up and pet them. Therefore, the mass clubbings, and the blood which covers the ice, is a disturbing sight.

Beyond that, the baby seals are too small to be used for food, although their tiny flippers are sold as a local delicacy. The only real use they are put to is use of their pelts, sold as high priced furs.

There is no question but that seal hunting, in some form, is justified. Man has already destroyed the balance of nature in that area. The natural predators of the seals, polar bears, are nearly extinct. The fish the seals feed on are also less numerous than in the past. Therefore, if the herd were not controlled in some manner, the seals would be subjected to mass starvation.

While I was in Newfoundland, I also spoke extensively with some of the people who participate in the seal slaughter, and depend on it economically. These are, for the most part, honest and hard working people. They are not wealthy, and about 2,000 of them participate in the seal harvest every year to supplement their incomes. I am awaiting additional information from the Canadian Government regarding the economic aspects of the seal slaughter. It is important to point out, however, that if the slaughter does lead to extinction of the species, the economic hardships would be at least as great as if the seal slaughter were discontinued.

Answers should be found, before it is too late. Informed studies and recommendations are needed. Perhaps the quotas should be lowered. Or perhaps the herd should be controlled through hunting of adult seals, which are useful as food, and for their oil, as well as for their much larger skins. I do not have good answers to those questions now, but hope I can contribute to the efforts to arrive at solutions.

Of course, our country cannot dictate to the Canadian Government or the Canadian people. Any action on our part must be sensitive to their needs and desires. But we do have an interest in protection of endangered species, especially species that affect several countries. We have exerted strong pressure on other countries, including Russia and Japan, to cease practices which threaten the extinction of certain species. Perhaps we should offer advice to our good friends in Canada. But if we do so, we must act not from emotionalism, but on the basis of the best possible information. At this point, my only objective is to gather that information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JENRETTE). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 10730, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3 of rule XXVII and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

"(1) occurs when such vessel is engaging in fishing within the fishery conservation zone; and

"(2) is attributable to (A) any other vessel, whether or not such other vessel is a vessel of the United States, or (B) an act of God.

"(c) A vessel owner is not eligible for compensation under this section with respect to fishing gear damage, loss, or destruction unless such owner—

"(1) is not in default with respect to contributions required of him under subsection (e) at the time the damage, loss, or destruction occurs;

"(2) makes application to the Secretary for compensation under this section within thirty days after the day on which the damage, loss, or destruction occurred or was first noticed by the owner;

Before undertaking any such review, the Secretary shall provide to the vessel owner opportunity to submit additional written or oral evidence relating to the decision. After review the Secretary shall issue a final determination with respect to the application.

"(2) the amount equal to 20 per centum of the estimated total amount of compensation which will be paid under this section during such year; by the estimated number of vessel owners who will make contributions under this section during such year. The Secretary shall deposit all contributions collected under this subsection into the fund.

"(f) No foreign fishing vessel shall be issued a permit under section 204 of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 (16 U.S.C. 1824) for any year after 1978 unless there is paid with respect to such vessel the damage assessment established for such year by the Secretary under this subsection. The damage assessment imposed with respect to each foreign fishing vessel for any year shall equal the amount computed by the Secretary by dividing the amount equal to 80 per centum of the estimated total amount of compensation which will be paid under this section during such year by the number of permits which will be issued for such year under such section 204. In the case compensation paid under this section during any year exceeds the estimate for such year on which damage assessments under this subsection were based, an amount equal to such excess shall be added to the estimate on which damage assessments for the following year are computed. All damage assessments collected pursuant to this subseection shall be deposited into the fund.

"(g)(1) There is established in the Treasury of the United States the Fishing Gear Damage Compensation Fund. The fund shall be available without fiscal year limitation as a revolving fund for the purposes of administering, and paying compensation awarded under, this section.

Sums in the fund which are not currently needed for the purpose of paying such awards shall be kept on deposit or invested in obligations of, or guaranteed by, the United States.

"(3) Whenever the amount in the fund is not sufficient to pay compensation under this section, the Secretary may issue, in an amount not to exceed $5,000,000, notes or other obligations to the Secretary of the Treasury, in such forms and denominations, bearing such maturities, and subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Such notices or other obligations shall bear interest at a rate to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury on the basis of the current average market yield on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities during the month preceding the issuance of such notices or other obligations. Moneys obtained by the Secretary under this paragraph shall be deposited in the fund and redemptions of any such notices or other obligations shall be made from the fund. The Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase any such notes or other obligations, and for such purpose he may use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act. The Secretary of the Treasury may sell any such notices or other obligations at such times and prices and upon such terms and conditions as he shall determine. All purchases, redemptions, and sales of such notes or other obligations by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States. (b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect October 1, 1978.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. RUPPE) will be recognized for 20 minutes each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the purposes of H.R. 10878 are threefold: To extend the cooperative insurance program carried out under section 7 of the Fishermen's Protective Act for an additional 3 years; to establish a compensation program for American fishermen whose fishing gear is damaged, destroyed, or lost as a result of the actions of foreign or domestic fishing vessels within the 200-mile fishery zone of the United States; and to provide additional protection to endangered and threatened species of fish and wildlife.

The need for this legislation—other than the fact that the appropriation-authorization under section 7 expires at the end of this fiscal year—arises from the fact that the United States does not recognize the right of any nation to regulate tuna. Tuna is a highly migratory species which spawns, and migrates over vast distances, in the Pacific, Atlantic, and Indian Oceans and, therefore, necessitates international regulation. Consequently, whenever a tuna vessel of the United States is seized by a foreign nation in contradiction of this policy, it is incumbent of the United States to indemnify the owners of such seized vessels for their losses when such vessel owners or operators are following a policy clearly established by the U.S. Government.

This policy on the part of the United States dates back to 1954 when the Fishermen's Protective Act first came into being. Under section 3 of that act, the U.S. Government agreed that when American fishing vessel owners were fishing in conformity with that policy and their vessels were seized and fines, fees, and other direct charges were required to be paid to obtain release of their vessels and crews resulting from such seizures beyond 3 miles from the shores of any nation, then the U.S. Government would reimburse the vessel owners and crews for those charges.

In 1967, the act was broadened to add a new section 7 to the act which is the provision which would be extended by this legislation. Section 7 allows any vessel owner—whether fishing for tuna, shrimp, or other species of fish—to voluntarily enter into an agreement with the Secretary of Commerce for the purpose of providing reimbursement for certain losses incurred resulting from an illegal seizure, such as those losses involving damage to, destruction of, or confiscation of the vessel, fishing gear, or other equipment, dockage and utility fees, confiscated or spoiled fish, and 50 percent of loss of fishing time during the detention period.

Under the program, the participating vessel owners have been paying about 40 percent of the cost and the U.S. Government the remaining 60 percent. There is presently in the reimbursement account approximately $1 million and there have been no illegal seizures since 1975.

The administration strongly supports the extension of this program and it is estimated there would be no cost to the Federal Government during the year extension of the act.

Mr. Speaker, when ordering the bill reported, the committee amended the bill, as introduced, in two important respects. First, it amended section 8 of the act—better known as the Pelly amendment. The Pelly amendment requires the Secretary of Commerce when she determines that nationals of a foreign country are conducting fishing operations in a manner which diminishes the effectiveness of an international fishery conservation program—to certify such fact to the President and once such a certification has been made, the President has the option of embargoing the fish products of the offending nation. This provision of the act has been a most effective tool in our effort to conserve the world's declining whale populations. In fact, the Pelly amendment played a major role in convincing Japan and Russia to adhere to the whaling quotas established by the International Whaling Commission.

As amended by the committee, section 8 would require the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Commerce whenever either determines that nationals of a foreign country are engaging in trade or taking which diminishes the effectiveness of any international program for endangered or threatened species to certify such fact to the President. Upon such a certification, the President would have the option of embargoing any or all wildlife products from the offending nation.

The second amendment to H.R. 10878 would rewrite section 10 of the act to provide for a modified no fault system of compensating American vessel owners whose fishing gear has been damaged, destroyed, or lost as a result of the action of any vessel within the zone. The program would be financed by participating American owners—who would pay 20 percent of its cost—and foreign vessel owners licensed to fish within the zone—who would pay the remaining 80 percent of such cost.

I am most hopeful that the difficulties associated with existing programs for compensating U.S. fishermen for gear damage—such as those involving claims boards with Russia, Poland, and Spain, and compulsory arbitration—will be overcome by this legislation and in the future our fishermen will be able to receive full and prompt reimbursement for their gear losses.

Mr. Speaker, when checking with the Budget Committee prior to scheduling H.R. 10878 for a vote, I was advised that the bill was in technical violation of the Budget Act in two respects. Language to correct these deficiencies has been agreed to by the Budget Committee and has been included in the bill, as amended. Attached to my statement is a brief explanation of the language added to the bill and the reasons therefor. That explanation follows:

Section 303(a)(4) of the Budget Act provides that it shall not be in order in either the House or Senate to consider any bill or resolution which provides new spending authority that would become effective during a fiscal year until the first Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for such year has been agreed to, which would be May 15 of this year.

The following language was inserted on page 1, line 10, after "1981": ", Provided, That any such payments made pursuant to subsections (a)–(d) shall be effective only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation Acts.".

This language would eliminate the new spending authority contained in section 1 of the bill and would—in lieu thereof—make the section subject to appropriations provided in advance in appropriation Acts.

Section 401(a) of the Budget Act provides that it is not in order in either the House or Senate to consider any bill or resolution which provides new spending authority that would allow the United States to incur indebtedness for the repayment of which the United States is liable, unless the spending authority is provided in advance by appropriation Acts.

On page 12, line 12, at the end of the sentence, the following language was added: "All borrowing authority contained herein shall be effective only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation Acts."

This language would correct this deficiency by making the new spending authority subject to appropriations provided in advance in appropriation Acts.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California (Mr. LEGGETT), the chairman of the Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment.

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as just explained by the chairman, the gentleman from New York, Mr. MURPHY, H.R. 10878 would extend the voluntary insurance program authorized by section 7 of the Fishermen's Protective Act for an additional 3 years, until October 1, 1981. I would like to confine my remarks to the two amendments adopted by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, in order to expand the success the United States has achieved in the conservation of fish and particularly whales under section 8 of the act—better known as the Pelly amendment—a number of conservation organizations strongly suggested the use of the Pelly amendment concept to extend additional protection to endangered and threatened species of wildlife. The representative of these organizations, Mr. Tom Garrett, pointed out that there are a large number of species of wildlife that are in a dramatic decline, in particular the jaguar and the ocelot in Central and South America.

Unfortunately, under the terms of the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species of Wild Fauna and Flora—which applies only to import, export, and reexport—the United States has no ability to persuade other nations to comply with the Convention and extend additional protection to declining species unless the illegally traded articles from such species are imported into the United States.

The amendment adopted by the committee would allow the Pelly amendment to be invoked in order to prohibit imports of any wildlife products from the offending nations whenever a determination is made by the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of Commerce, for instance, that wildlife products protected under the Convention are being shipped between two nations and that the actions of such nations are diminishing the effectiveness of an international program for endangered or threatened species.

Mr. Speaker, the second amendment adopted by the committee would set up a sort of modified no-fault insurance system for reimbursing American fishermen for damage done to their fishing gear by foreign or domestic vessels.

The system is quite an improvement over the existing systems which involve too much redtape, and which make claims too difficult to collect.

The program would be financed primarily by foreign fishing vessels authorized to fish within our 200-mile fishing zone and if a vessel owner refuses to pay his part of the annual assessment established by the Secretary of Commerce, his fishing privileges would be cut off. This, I think, Mr. Speaker, will result in the attention being given to these claims to which they are entitled and will result in the fishermen obtaining prompt reimbursement for their gear damage. In this way, a small fisherman will be able to replace his lost gear and continue in business.

Mr. Speaker, I think this is a good bill and I urge its prompt passage.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation which would extend until October 1, 1981, the voluntary insurance provisions of the Fishermen's Protective Act. More importantly, the legislation will give added strength and emphasis to the International Convention on Endangered Species of Fauna and Flora.

While the decline of many species has been arrested in the past few years, in part through U.S. efforts, the status of a vast number of other species has undergone a dramatic decline. In this decade alone, even since the passage of the Endangered Species Act of 1973, a host of internationally insignficant species has been driven to the point of extinction. In fact, the Department of the Interior estimates that approximately 300 species are becoming extinct each decade. Although the International Convention provides a mechanism for protecting fish and wildlife, the sad fact is that only 44 nations are members of the Convention. To extend the effect of the Convention, H.R. 10878 authorizes the President to embargo the importation of wildlife products, excluding products for scientific purposes, from any nation whose nationals are acting in a manner which diminishes the effectiveness of the International Convention.

H.R. 10878 also provides for the establishment of a comprehensive and effective procedure for compensating U.S. fishermen whose gear has been damaged or destroyed because of the activities of foreign fishermen operating within the U.S. 200-mile zone. Existing methods of compensation have proven inadequate because they require that the U.S. fishermen be able to prove the precise identity of the foreign vessel causing the damage or destruction. For a lobster fishermen who leaves his pots on 1 day and returns 3 days later to retrieve them, this is an impossible burden of proof. As a result of this burden, thousands of dollars of claims have gone uncompensated. H.R. 10878 remedies this problem by establishing a modified no-fault compensation system funded by contributions from participating U.S. fishermen and from foreign fishing vessels operating within the U.S. 200-mile zone.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10878 is an important legislative initiative and I urge that it be adopted.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES).

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this legislation. As one of its original sponsors, I am confident that this legislation will serve well our efforts to revitalize the American fishing industry and protect endangered and threatened species of wildlife.

I have the privilege of representing the people of south Jersey in Congress. This area, with over 20 miles of coastline, contains one of the most important centers for the commercial fishing industry in our country.

Consequently, I would like to use this opportunity to point out the importance of section 3 of the bill. This section would set up a new program to compensate fishermen whose gear is damaged by other vessels operating with the 200-mile fishing limit.

The current programs for compensating fishermen and boat owners for losses and damages to their gear have simply not been adequate. These programs, in spite of the best intentions of the administering bodies, have not provided prompt or adequate compensation to a fisherman whose gear has been damaged or destroyed by others through no fault of his own.

One of the major problems with the current programs is the burden of proving the identity of a boat that actually causes the damage to a fisherman's gear. Although this burden-of-proof requirement is a sound practice in other fields, it is not reasonable in light of day-to-day fishing activities.

For example, a fisherman may set his gear, such as a lobster pot, at a certain time and not return to it for several hours or days. It is difficult, if not impossible for such a fisherman to prove the identity of any party who damages his gear. A similar problem faces a long-line fisherman who may have 15 miles of gear stretching behind his vessel. If a boat cuts through his gear at the 12-mile point, the fisherman will again have a very difficult task in determining the guilty party.

Another problem with the current compensation programs is the unsatisfactory amount of time that fishermen have to wait for settlement of their claims. For instance, under the compensation program set up in the 200-Mile Fishing Limit Act, the processing of damage claims against foreign fishermen has averaged 3 months.

Still other problems are the lack of compensation for small claims under some of the existing programs and the lack of clarity over whether compensation is to be based on the replacement value or depreciated value of the gear.

The new compensation program proposed by section 3 would go a long way toward correcting these problems. Under this section, a fisherman can be compensated for any damage, loss, or destruction of his fishing gear, if the damage, loss, or destruction is caused by any other vessel, foreign or American, operating within the 200-mile limit. He would not have to prove the identity of the party at fault. He also can be compensated for any damage or loss caused by an act of God.

By removing the burden of proving the identity of the guilty party, the section thus would enable many fishermen to obtain the compensation that is now unavailable to them.

In addition, section 3 would require a prompt determination of compensation due to a fisherman claiming damages. Under this section, the Secretary of Commerce is required to make an initial determination of compensation for a fisherman's claim within 30 days after it is filed. If the determination is not appealed by the fisherman, it becomes final.

The compensation would be based on the depreciated value of the gear damaged. There would be no minimum damages required for compensation.

I also would like to point out an added advantage to this program: it very likely will not add any additional costs for the U.S. taxpayer. The program will be funded by modest payments from American fishermen and from those foreign fishermen who receive permits to fish within our 200-mile limit. Both the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and the Congressional Budget Office estimate that the bill will incur no significant cost to the Government.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield as much time as he may consume to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FORSYTHE).

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10878 which extends the authorization for section 7 of the Fishermen's Protective Act for 3 additional years. I believe it is critically important that we extend the provisions of section 7. If we fail to approve H.R. 10878, it will be a clear signal to the international community that the United States no longer considers tuna to be outside the scope of the 200-mile fishery conservation zones which are being established throughout the world. Such an action by this Congress will undermine the efforts of U.S. negotiators who are seeking to establish an effective and comprehensive international regime for the conservation and management of tuna. It will also have a dramatically adverse effect on the U.S. tuna fleet which takes a substantial percentage of its harvest within 200 miles of other nations' shores and which depends on the Fishermen's Protective Act for support.

H.R. 10878 also contains two significant amendments to the Fishermen's Protective Act. The first lends added support to the International Convention for the conservation of Endangered Species of Fauna and Flora. This amendment provides that the President may embargo the importation of wildilfe products, excluding products for scientific research, from any nation whose nationals are act- the importation of wildlife products, exing in a manner which diminishes the effectiveness of the International Convention.

Each year hundreds of species become extinct throughout the world. Decisive action must be taken to stem this tide and I believe the provisions of H.R. 10878 are a major step forward.

The second amendment to the Fishermen's Protective Act made by H.R. 10878 provides for the establishment of a simple and effective mechanism for compensating U.S. fishermen whose gear has been lost, damaged, or destroyed while those fishermen were engaged in fishing within the U.S. 200-mile zone. With the enactment of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, U.S. fishermen were given renewed hope that a procedure for the rapid and fair disposition of their gear damage claims would be established. Prior to the enactment of this legislation, U.S. fishermen were limited to the vagaries of proceeding in court or to the ponderous procedures of the Russian or Polish claims boards. To remedy these problems, those of us who were closely associated with the passage of the 200-mile act intended that the Secretary of Commerce would establish an administrative procedure for the prompt disposition of damage claims by U.S. fishermen.

Instead, U.S. fishermen have seen the continuation of the claims boards. In addition, the National Marine Fisheries Service has promulgated regulations providing for an arbitration procedure for gear damage claims totaling less than $25,000.

Unfortunately, these regulations suffer from the same essential weakness as do the claims boards—that is, that a U.S. fisherman seeking compensation must be able to establish the precise identity of the foreign fishing vessel causing the damage. U.S. fixed gear fishermen, who set their gear on one day and return in a few days to check the gear, are often unable to meet this burden of proof. U.S. longline fishermen confronts the same dilemma, in that gear stretching 15 miles behind the vessel might be severed at the 12th mile by a vessel which can be seen by radar but which cannot be identified as to its nationality. As a result of these problems, relatively few U.S. fishermen will be able to secure compensation under the existing administrative claims settlement mechanisms.

Furthermore, pursuant to the arbitration regulations, it is entirely likely that in every instance the arbitrator will be the national of a third nation. Finally, the U.S. fisherman may be forced to absorb the cost of the arbitration proceedings and if he requests an interpreter or a stenographer, he will be forced to pay the costs of these services.

The legislation which was adopted by this Congress during the last session to provide a gear compensation program suffers from many similar weaknesses. In the first place, claims totaling less than $2,000 are totally excluded. More significantly, the new law will place on U.S. fishermen the same burden of proof that has rendered the claims boards an ineffective mechanism for compensating for gear losses. Pursuant to the new program, U.S. fishermen will have to establish the identity of the offending vessel.

Because of the limitations of these systems, I offered an amendment to H.R. 10878 which was accepted and which is before us today. This amendment establishes a voluntary insurance program for U.S. fishermen operating within the U.S. 200-mile zone. Participating fishermen will be eligible to receive compensation for the depreciated value of any fishing gear which is lost, damaged, or destroyed because of the activity of any other vessel—whether or not it is a vessel of the United States—or by an act of God. Thus, U.S. fishermen will no longer be required to establish the precise identity of the vessel causing the damage to its gear. To eliminate fraud, my amendment provides that the claimant shall be compensated only for the depreciated value of the gear involved. Furthermore, if there is evidence of negligence on the part of the U.S. fisherman, the amount of any award shall be reduced proportionately. Finally, my amendment provides stiff penalties for any fraudulent or misleading statement on the part of any person seeking compensation under this program.

I should also note that the program is to be funded entirely by fees paid by participating U.S. fishermen and by assessments levied against foreign fishing vessels operating within the U.S. 200-mile zone.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10878 is an important and significant legislative initiative. It provides for an effective mechanism for protecting U.S. fishermen who have suffered damages to their gear caused by the activities of foreign fishing vessels. It gives the International Convention for the Conservation of Endangered Species of Fauna and Flora new emphasis and new strength. Finally, H.R. 10878 provides much-needed assistance to the U.S. tuna industry. I urge that this bill be approved.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 10878, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR CONSERVATION PROGRAMS ON MILITARY RESERVATIONS

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 10882) to authorize appropriations to carry out conservation programs on military reservations and public lands during fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 106(b) of the Act entitled "An Act to promote effectual planning, development, maintenance, and coordination of wildlife, fish and game conservation and rehabilitation in military reservations", approved September 15, 1960 (16 U.S.C. 670f(b)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "five fiscal years" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "eight fiscal years"; and

(2) by striking out "four fiscal years" in the third sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "seven fiscal years".

SEC. 2. Subsections (a) and (b) of section 209 of such Act of September 15, 1960 (16 U.S.C. 670o (a) and (b)) are each amended by striking out "four fiscal years" and inserting in lieu thereof "seven fiscal years".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. RUPPE) will be recognized for 20 minutes each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10882 authorizes appropriations to carry out what is commonly known as the Sikes Act. This legislation will insure that funding will continue to be available to the Secretaries of the Interior, Defense and Agriculture to carry out wildlife conservation and public recreation programs on public lands.

The Sikes Act was originally passed to take advantage of the tremendous fish and wildlife and outdoor recreation potential on 26 million acres of military property, and over 620 million acres of other federally owned lands. The Sikes Act recognizes that, for many communities in this country, the local military base offers the most accessible opportunity for wildlife oriented recreation. This act insures that, when feasible, the Nation's military lands will be available for the enjoyment of the American public, as well as military personnel.

The Sikes Act also expresses the strong congressional intent that the Nation's two largest landlords—the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management—pay serious attention to fish and wildlife conservation. These two agencies alone control more than 620 million acres of public property. Much of this land is prime wildlife habitat.

Although a number of worthwhile programs have been conducted under the Sikes Act, the act has been consistently neglected by the Departments of Defense and Interior. I am hopeful that we can change this attitude. This country spends a significant amount of money each year acquiring wildlife habitat and yet we are not taking proper care of the land we already own. Full funding of the Sikes Act would insure that we do.

It is unfortunate that the Federal agencies have given the Sikes Act such a low priority. Despite agency inaction, however, a number of military bases in the country have utilized the Sikes Act to develop creative wildlife conservation programs.

In my home State of New York, for example, Griffiss Air Force Base has developed one of the best wildlife conservation programs in the country. Last year Griffiss managed to receive the Conservation Award from the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service with virtually no Sikes Act funding.

Mr. Speaker, it is imperative that the Federal agencies provide much more funding and technical assistance to the States to perform fish and wildlife conservation, and public outdoor recreation programs on federally owned lands. Hopefully, with congressional passage and subsequent enactment of H.R. 10882, the Secretaries of the Interior and Defense will alter this shortsighted policy and give the Sikes Act the priority it deserves.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment, the gentleman from California (Mr. LEGGETT).

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10882, legislation extending the authorization of appropriations through fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981, to carry out what is commonly known as the Sikes Act.

Title I of the Sikes Act authorizes $1.5 million to be appropriated to the Secretary of Defense to carry out wildlife conservation and public outdoor recreation programs on 25.4 million acres of military installations throughout the country. These programs would be in accordance with a cooperative plan mutually agreed upon by the appropriate agency in the State in which the installation is located and the Secretaries of Defense and the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized $2 million under title I to provide technical assistance to the States and the Secretary of Defense in carrying out these programs.

Title II directs the Secretaries of the Interior and Agriculture, in cooperation with appropriate State agencies, to plan and coordinate programs for the conservation and rehabilitation of fish and wildlife on lands under their respective jurisdictions. Additionally, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to implement such programs on lands under the jurisdiction of the Department of Energy and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. Each Secretary is authorized $10 million annually to carry out the initiatives specified in title II.

Unless H.R. 10882 is enacted, the appropriations authorizations contained in both title I and II of the act will expire at the end of fiscal year 1978.

Although the Sikes Act has suffered from neglect by Defense and Interior, it remains a noteworthy conservative measure for two reasons. First, for many communities in this country the local military reservation offers the most accessible opportunity for wildlife enjoyment, hunting or outdoor recreation. This act insures that the Nation's military lands will be available for the enjoyment of all American citizens, not merely military personnel. Second, it expresses the strong desire of Congress that the Nation's two largest landlords—the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management—pay serious attention to fish and wildlife conservation. It is absolutely necessary that these two agencies carry out extensive fish and wildlife conservation activities. They control between the two of them, more than 620 million acres of land, much of which is prime wildlife habitat.

Mr. Speaker, several of the agencies included within the Sikes Act have been funding fish and wildlife conservation, and outdoor recreation, programs with moneys tapped from their general appropriations. It is commenable that these agencies are carrying out fish and wildlife programs on lands under their jurisdiction. However, the committee wishes to make it clear that the funds authorized by the Sikes Act are to be used as a supplemental to, and not in place of, their general appropriations to carry out conservation programs.

All of the agencies affected by the Sikes Act submitted testimony or departmental reports in favor of enactment of H.R. 10882, and I urge its prompt passage.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10882, which extends the authorization for the Sikes Act for an additional 3 years. The Sikes Act was enacted for the purpose of implementing outdoor recreation and fish and wildlife conservation programs on military reservations and certain other federally owned lands.

In an era in which there is an increasing public demand for the preservation of fish and wildlife, it is vitally important that these values on our Federal lands be protected through aggressive conservation programs. The importance of these lands to wildlife is demonstrated by the fact that on Navy lands alone there are 17 endangered and 5 threatened species. A few examples convey an idea of some of the important habitat values in military lands. The military installations along the lower California coast, Imperia Beach Naval Station, Camp Pendleton, and Point Mugu Naval Air Station contain important meeting areas for the California least tern and the lightfooted clapper rail, both of which are endangered species. Endangered red-cockaded woodpecker is found at the Eglin Air Force Base in Florida, and at Fort Bragg and Camp LeJeune in North Carolina. The Okaloosa darter, an endangered fish, is found in only five small streams originating on Eglin Air Force Base. The endangered Mohave chub has been stocked in ponds on the China Lake Naval Ordinance Test Station in California to insure their protection. Excellent waterfowl habitat is being protected on Bloodsworth Island in the Chesapeake Bay by the Patuxent River Naval Air Station.

Despite the importance of existing Federal lands to the conservation of native fish and wildlife, relatively little has been done on these lands. It is critically important that management plans, basic resources surveys and inventories be developed so that effective and comprehensive conservation programs can be developed for these lands.

Despite the important needs for wildlife conservation on Federal lands, inadequate attention has been focused on the implementation of the Sikes act. None of the Federal agencies that are authorized moneys under the Sikes act has ever requested an appropriation under the act. Instead, these agencies have relied upon their general authority to fund the Sikes act programs. Failure to request appropriations under the Sikes act is, in certain instances, reflective of an insufficient commitment to the preservation of the fish and wildlife values found on Federal lands.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the rapid passage of this important legislation so that Congress can provide a signal to Federal land management agencies that wildlife and recreational values should receive higher priority consideration in the management of Federal lands. It is time we recognize that the American public will benefit significantly from the implementation of effective fish and wildlife conservation programs on Federal lands.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FORSYTHE).

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, in 1903 when President Theodore Roosevelt established the first national wildlife refuge, he foresaw the need for a comprehensive national program for the conservation and protection of this Nation's fish and wildlife resources. Since that time, we have witnessed the steady growth of the refuge system, which now encompasses 34 million acres. The growth of this system reflects a national commitment to the preservation of the quality of life in America, including the preservation of the diversity of fish and wildlife found throughout the United States.

The National Wildlife Refuge System, however, represents only a small portion of Federal lands with significant fish and wildlife values. The Department of Defense, for example, owns over 19 million acres which have significant fish and wildlife values. Over 17 endangered and 5 threatened species are found on Navy lands, and the waterfowl habitat on other military lands is considered excellent.

Mr. Speaker, our national goal of fish and wildlife protection could be substantially furthered if these and other federally owned lands were managed to optimize their fish and wildlife resources.

H.R. 10882, which extends the Sikes Act, provides an effective mechanism for accomplishing this objective. The Sikes Act authorizes various Federal agencies and departments to enter into cooperative agreements with the States for the preservation and enhancement of the fish and wildlife resources found on the Federal lands. Although I am deeply distressed by the fact that certain Federal agencies, particularly the Department of Defense, have failed to aggressively implement their responsibilities under the Sikes Act, I believe it is critical that this Congress reaffirm its commitment to the Sikes Act by extending its authorization.

Mr. Speaker, the Sikes Act offers this country an excellent tool for preserving the full range of fish and wildlife values found in the United States. If we fail to act today to approve H.R. 10882, the quality of life for future generations of Americans may be substantially reduced.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 10882.

The question was taken.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

FISHERY CONSERVATION AND MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1976 AUTHORIZATION

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 10732) to authorize appropriations to carry out the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 during fiscal year 1979, 1980, and 1981, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 10732

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 406 of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 (16 U.S.C. 1882) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(5) $40,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979.

"(6) $45,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980.

"(7) $45,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981.".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. RUPPE) will be recognized for 20 minutes each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10732 would authorize appropriations to carry out what is commonly known as the 200-Mile Fishery Zone Act. This legislation will insure that funding will continue to be available to the Secretary of Commerce and the Regional Fishery Management Councils for carrying out their responsibilities under this act.

The 200-Mile Fishery Zone Act became Public Law 94-265 on April 13, 1976. That act made it unlawful for the first time—beginning with March 1, 1977—for foreign fishing vessels to fish within 200 miles of our shores without a permit. Already, that landmark piece of legislation has had a salutary effect on protecting and conserving the fisheries resources of our coastal shores.

For instance, while our annual domestic catch has remained about the same for the past 2 years—approximately 2.5 million metric tons—we have seen the foreign catch off our coastal shores decline from 2.7 million metric tons in 1976 to 1.7 million metric tons in 1977, a 37-percent decliine.

Similarly, we have seen a decline in the monthly average of foreign fishing vessels off our shores. Figures released by the National Marine Fisheries Service indicate that approximately 780 foreign fishing vessels operated within the zone during 1977, about one-third less than the approximately 1,200 vessels operating within the zone in 1976.

Early signs indicate that there is a new vigor in the U.S. fishing industry. Orders for new fishing vessels have increased dramatically and there is a new interest seen in replacing and modernizing old fishing gear and in expanding, and building new, processing plants.

Mr. Speaker, this act is beginning to work but much more remains to be done. Thus far, only three fishery management plans have been prepared and approved by the Secretary. Two of these involve fish in the Atlantic coast—haddock, cod, and yellowtail surf clams and quahogs—and the third involves salmon in the Pacific coast. More than 75 plans have been identified by the 8 Regional Fishery Management Councils established by the act that need to be developed. This is a monumental task these Councils are facing and it is only through the passage of this legislation that these Councils will be able to get the necessary funds with which to prepare these plans.

H.R. 10732 would authorize to be appropriated $40 million for fiscal year 1979 and $45 million for each of fiscal years 1980 and 1981.

Mr. Speaker, the administration requested that only $22 million be appropriated to carry out this act in 1979. Tomorrow morning, I plan to appear before the Appropriations Subcommittee on State, Justice, Commerce, and Judiciary and request that $15.4 million be added to their request for fiscal year 1979 so that the Department of Commerce will have adequate funds for carrying out this act.

Hopefully, with the prompt passage of this legislation, which authorizes these additional funds, our fisheries resources will receive the attention to which they are entitled.

I now yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. LEGGETT) such time as he may consume.

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10732 would extend the funding authorization under the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 for an additional 3 years at a level of funding of $40 million for fiscal year 1979 and $45 million for each of fiscal years 1980 and 1981.

These authorization levels are in line with the original requests of the National Marine Fisheries Service before they were cut back by the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the Department of Commerce, and, finally, by the Office of Management and Budget.

Mr. Speaker, one of the primary purposes of this act is to provide for the conservation and management of the fishery resources off our coastal shores. To carry out this task, the act provided for the creation of eight regional fishery management councils. These councils, which have the responsibility of developing management plans for each of the fisheries within their respective geographical areas, have identified more than 80 fisheries that will require management plans. Thus far, only three of such plans are in existence and are being implemented by the Secretary of Commerce. Two more of such plans have been approved by the Secretary and are awaiting the implementing regulations. This leaves more than 75 plans still remaining to be developed and implemented. This is a monumental task facing these councils and the passage of this legislation will give assurance to these councils that the funds they need with which to properly prepare these remaining plans will be available.

Mr. Speaker, other purposes of the act call for the rebuilding of overfished stocks and the development of fisheries which are currently underutilized or not utilized by U.S. fishermen. To meet these responsibilities, more accurate biological data and fisheries statistics are needed. H.R. 10732, as amended, makes allowances for these needs and, hopefully, the Secretary of Commerce will take the necessary steps to see that these data are gathered at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10732 was unanimously reported by the committee, it has the strong support of the administration, and I urge its prompt passage.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10732, which extends and increases the authorization for the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 for an additional 3 years.

The enactment of the FCMA represented the dawning of a new era in fisheries management. Prior to the enactment of this legislation, massive foreign fishing fleets operating off the U.S. shores were depleting our fishery resources. The United States had no effective mechanism by which to protect our resources from this overfishing. As a result, numerous species became depleted. The FCMA, however, offers a new hope for rebuilding these fisheries and for preventing the depletion of additional fisheries.

Under the act, eight regional management councils are charged with the responsibility for developing fishery conservation and management plans which will determine the amount of fish which can be harvested without damaging the resource. The plans may also establish regulations on the type of gear which may be used, on the season and area in which fishing may occur.

Already, the councils have developed 5 management plans and it is anticipated that in the next 2 fiscal years an additional 75 plans will be developed. The completion of these management plans will provide a comprehensive framework for protecting the extensive fishery resources of the United States. By protecting the resource from depletion, the Fishery Conservation and Management Act provides a foundation on which the U.S. fishing industry can be revitalized.

If these hopes are to be realized, it is essential that the regional fishery management councils and the National Marine Fisheries Service be given the necessary resources with which to do the job. It is my view that the current level of funding for the act is insufficient. The available biological data on which to base fishery management plans is inadequate and the development of a sufficient data base will require an extensive research program.

In the absence of an increase in the level of commitment to the Fishery Conservation and Management Act, the effective management of our fisheries resources will be impossible, H.R. 10732 accurately reflects the research needs of the National Marine Fisheries Service and the regional fishery management councils and provides an adequate level of funding to the councils. It is for these reasons, Mr. Speaker, that I support the enactment of H.R. 10732.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to my distinguished colleague, the ranking member of the Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FORSYTHE).

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10732, which extends the authorization for the Fishery Conservation and Management Act for an additional 3 years.

The Fishery Conservation and Management Act represents a bold initiative to assure the preservation and effective management of this Nation's marine resources. Twenty percent of the world's fishery resources are found within 200 miles of the U.S. coast and the FCMA gives our Nation the ability, indeed the responsibility, for managing this substantial resource.

In order to provide for the integrated management of our fishery resources, the act establishes eight regional management councils, which are charged with responsibility for developing management plans for each fishery within their respective regions. These management plans must determine the optimum yield for each fishery and must establish an effective management program for the fishery.

Thus far, the councils have completed management plans for five fisheries. However, with the knowledge and experience gained since the inception of the act, the councils anticipate the completion of 35 additional management plans before the end of the current fiscal year. These fishery management plans play a critical role in accomplishing the objectives of the act. It is, therefore, vitally important that the regional councils receive adequate funding to develop these plans in a timely manner.

One of the central problems the councils have confronted is the lack of adequate biological data. The councils and the National Marine Fisheries Service must be given sufficient funds to collect and analyze this biological data so that the councils can move forward with the development of fishery conservation plans. H.R. 10732 will provide these funds.

Mr. Speaker, the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 is a landmark piece of legislation. It provided a foundation upon which the U.S. fishing industry can be revitalized. The assured access to the resource which is given to U.S. fishermen by the act can, and will, provide the economic incentive which will lead to a resurgent fishing industry, an increased supply of seafood for the U.S. consumer and a decrease in our seafood balance-of-payments deficit.

None of this will be possible, however, if the resource is not protected—and the resource cannot be protected unless the Fishery Conservation and Management Act is fully and effectively implemented. H.R. 10732 provides the necessary funds which will insure the success of our fishery management program and I urge the adoption of this legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there are no further requests for time, the question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 10732, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3 of rule XXVII and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

COUNCIL ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY AUTHORIZATION

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 10884) to authorize appropriations to the Council on Environmental Quality for fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 10884

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 205 of the Environmental Quality Improvement Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4374) is amended by striking out subsections (c) and (d) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(c) $3,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1977, September 30, 1978, September 30, 1979, September 30, 1980, and September 30, 1981.".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. RUPPE) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10884 would authorize appropriations through fiscal year 1981 to the Council on Environmental Quality.

Despite its small size, the Council on Environmental Quality is charged with many diverse tasks relating to our country's environmental health. It acts as the principal adviser to the President in matters concerning environmental issues, and has the responsibility of informing and educating the public about methods for protecting and enhancing our environment. The Council assists in coordinating the environmental review requirements of Federal programs and develops recommendations for simplifying and consolidating these requirements.

Most importantly, the Council has the monumental duty of monitoring the effectiveness of the National Environmental Policy Act, a landmark environmental measure developed by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in 1969. The National Environmental Policy Act requires Federal agencies to consider the environmental impact of any project which may significantly alter the quality of the human environment. More than any other single statute, NEPA has successfully forced Federal agencies to seek the most environmentally sound approach to any Federal action.

Over the past year, CEQ has completed several major projects affecting the environmental health of this Nation. It developed the President's environmental message issued in April 1977. This message described the President's environmental program for his first term. In the last year, the Council also prepared a major report on the Arctic natural gas pipeline route alternatives.

The Government does have a number of environmental agencies, but CEQ is the only one which attempts to make sense out of the hundreds of programs affecting our environment. Its goal is a more effective, less wasteful, and more environmentally conscious Federal system.

If this legislation is not enacted, the Council's funding authorization would be reduced to a minimal $1 million, a sum which would severely hamper CEQ's work. Substantially more funds must be available to the Council if it is to continue to perform its obligations under the National Environmental Policy Act. H.R. 10884 will provide some of these funds.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California (Mr. LEGGETT).

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10884, the purpose of which is to continue the present level of funding available to the Council on Environmental Quality by amending the Environmental Quality Improvement Act of 1970 to authorize the appropriation of $3 million for each of fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981.

The Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ) was created by the National Environmental Policy Act (NEPA) of 1969. NEPA provided funding for the Council at a constant level of $1 million for each fiscal year after 1972.

Shortly after NEPA was enacted Congress also adopted the Environmental Quality Improvement Act of 1970. This act created an Office of Environmental Quality under the direction of the Chairman of CEQ. The authorization for this office has been utilized by CEQ for the carrying out of many of its programs. This authorization expires on September 30, 1978.

CEQ is assigned many duties and responsibilities under NEPA, the Environmental Quality Improvement Act, and numerous Executive orders. Despite these numerous responsibilities, the Council has been allocated only 32 permanent staff positions for the current fiscal year which is a reduction of 33 positions from its largest size in 1972. Because the Council lacks the staff required to fully perform its responsibilities concerning environmental quality, it conducts much of its research and assessment of environmental issues with the assistance of outside consultants and research institutions. Studies recently completed by the Council include assessments of environmental issues associated with energy development, hardrock mining, air quality, coastal zone management, environmental data gathering, toxic chemicals, and wildlife conservation.

The Council is anxious to expand its mission, and representatives from the environmental community testified at our subcommttee hearings that the work of the Council is essential to the continued environmental awareness in the Federal Government. Without the authorization provided by the Environmental Quality Improvement Act, CEQ would not be able to continue as the sole environmental watchdog in the Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, I might point out in closing that Charlie Warren, the Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality, has been doing an excellent job since he took over as chairman last year.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the prompt passage of H.R. 10884.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the passage of H.R. 10884. This bill provides a 3-year authorization for the Office of Environmental Quality at a level of $3 million per year. The Office of Environmental Quality provides staff to carry out the work of the Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ).

The authorization level found in H.R. 10884 is the same as that set forth in Public Law 94–298 for fiscal year 1978. Reorganization Act No. 1 of 1977 gave some of CEQ's duties to the Environmental Protection Agency and gave it other new duties.

CEQ has also been directed to reduce its present permanent staff of 40 to 32 by the end of 1978. Given the revision of its duties and the reduction of its staff, the $3 million authorized under H.R. 10884 should be enough to permit CEQ to maintain its present level of effectiveness.

I believe that the work of the CEQ must be carried on for several reasons. The President and the various component parts of his administration need its balanced and carefully considered advice on matters relating to the environment. We will all benefit from CEQ's continued efforts to improve the quality of environmental information available to policymakers and planners and the level of understanding of the economic impacts of environmental programs. CEQ is trying to assist efforts to coordinate Federal environmental programs to eliminate waste and confusion. The Council is also developing recommendations for simplifying and consolidating environmental review requirements.

Perhaps the most important task before CEQ is the promulgation of regulations that will, for the first time, provide a uniform framework governing the procedural steps to be taken by Federal agencies in the environmental impact statement process. Their aim is to reduce the volume of paperwork required and that is certainly a much-needed and long-awaited step.

I am not one who is satisfied with the implementation of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969. However, CEQ seems to be heading in the right direction. I support H.R. 10884 in the belief that it will hasten the day when the environmental impact statement evolves into the complete but realistic and concise decisionmaking tool that it was intended to be.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished ranking member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. FORSYTHE).

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10884, a bill which would authorize annual appropriations through fiscal year 1981 for the Office of Environmental Quality.

The Office of Environmental Quality was created under the Environmental Quality Improvement Act of 1970 (EQIA) to provide staff support for the Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ). The CEQ is a three-member Council, and was created as part of the Office of the President by the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 (NEPA) to advise the President on environmental issues and to perform various other duties relating to governmental policy in environmental issues. One of the Council's most important duties is to see that Federal agencies are complying with NEPA's environmental impact statement procedures. Under Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1977, CEQ now has the power to promulgate actual regulations to govern and standardize agency procedures during every step of the environmental impact statement process.

Public Law 94–298 authorized an annual authorization of $3.0 million for the Office of Environmental Quality through fiscal year 1978. The bill before us today, H.R. 10884, would simply continue this level of authorization for the next 3 fiscal years. The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries feels that the continuation of the present level of authorization is warranted so that the important advisory, coordination, and information-supplying functions of CEQ continue.

During the committee's hearings on H.R. 10884, it was noted that the authorized staff level for CEQ is at an all-time low and that reorganization plans affecting CEQ may be in the offing. It is my conviction that further staff reductions at CEQ would not only be unwarranted but would also seriously inhibit the Council's ability to function. There is some question as to their ability to do so at the present staffing level. As to reorganization, I think it is fair to say that the committee feels very strongly that any reorganization which would involve CEQ losing its independent status would be wrong conceptually and, further, would require congressional action. Congress established the CEQ as an independent office to maximize its effectiveness in dealing with agency compliance with NEPA. To make CEQ a part of any present or projected agency would render impossible the achievement of the purposes for which Congress created it. I trust that talk of such a reorganization will not proceed beyond that stage.

The role of CEQ is central to the achievement of our national environmental goals. The Council must be assured of at least a bare minimum level of staff support in its work. H.R. 10884 represents a level of funding which provides just that. I ask my colleagues to join with me in approving H.R 10884. ● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I am strongly supportive of H.R. 10884, the authorizing legislation for the Council on Environmental Quality, which comes before the House today.

The Council on Environmental Quality plays a vital role not only in advising the President on important environmental issues, but also in insuring that environmental considerations are given proper weight in formulating energy, economic, foreign, and other national priorities.

Even with its modest resources, CEQ has proven itself to be one of the most competent and credible organizations within the Executive Office of the President. As I have stated to my colleagues in the past, whatever effectiveness the National Environmental Policy Act has had is due to the work of CEQ. However, recent broadening of CEQ's responsibilities makes this increased authorization absolutely necessary if the Council is to properly carry out its assigned tasks. As the committee has noted, the size of the Council's staff has actually decreased by almost 50 percent since 1972, even though its role has been greatly expanded. If this legislation were not approved, the budgetary constraints which would be imposed upon the Council would severely damage its effectiveness.

I applaud the chairman and members of the committee for their sensitivity to the increased resource needs of CEQ, and I am confident that with passage of this measure the Council can continue to effectively represent environmental considerations and play an important role in the formulation of policy during this administration.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JENRETTE). The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 10884, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH).

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 11445 and urge its immediate passage.

INTRODUCTION AND BACKGROUND

H.R. 11445 is an omnibus bill of five titles. Among its primary purposes are the continuation of two important initiatives which the Small Business Committee accomplished last year through passage of H.R. 692 (Public Law 95–89); a workable system of loan assistance to victims of natural disasters and authorization of program levels for all of SBA's major programs.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION DISASTER LOAN AUTHORITY

(A) INTEREST RATES

Extensive examination of Federal disaster assistance programs and objectives resulted last year in H.R. 692 which was enacted as Public Law 95–89. That law reduced the interest rate on SBA natural disaster loans to homeowners to 1 percent on the first $10,000 of the loan; 3 percent on the next $30,000 of the loan; and did not provide for any cancellation or forgiveness. The interest rate on SBA natural disaster loans to all other victims was reduced to 3 percent on the first $250,000; and similar reductions were made in the FmHA disaster or emergency loan program.

All disaster loans over these special ceilings are made at an interest rate of 6⅝ percent which is based on the cost of money to the Federal Government plus one-quarter percent.

(B) ELIGIBILITY

The provisions governing SBA's present disaster program expire next October 1. We believe that it should be extended in substantially the same form for a period ending with the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1982. This would permit the next Congress to review the program and enact another extension 2 years from this time and remain in full compliance with the schedules provided in the Budget Act.

Ever since flooding in Rapid City and Alaska and Hurricanes Agnes, Betsy, and Camille, Congress has demonstrated repeatedly that it favors action to help people and communities suffering physical disasters. Often in the past, a program has been passed immediately after a disaster has occurred and, as a result, these programs have sometimes been thrown together rapidly.

We believe that the provisions of the current program are substantially what should be included in an extended program. However, the committee acted to set the interest rate on nonhomeowner disaster loans at 5 percent up to $250,000 rather than 3 percent. This would reflect the consensus of House Members as expressed by the vote on S. 1306 last November. The administration supports the 5 percent rate on these loans and it would equal the rate recently approved by the Committee on Agriculture for the Farmers Home Administration emergency loan program.

The purpose of these loans is not limited to helping an individual recover from a bad loss, but is also designed to help revive communities which have been the victims of a disaster. Therefore, these loans have not been restricted to undercapitalized small businesses but have also been made available to offset losses of all businesses and charitable institutions which provided goods, services and jobs in the community, and to those whose homes were damaged.

The administration has proposed excluding from eligibility those small businesses which happen to be agricultural producers, saying farmers should be required to rely upon the Farmers Home Administration's program. FmHA programs are inferior and in many ways inadequate in this area. To force small businesses who happen to be farmers to rely upon the inferior FmHA program would be discrimination and constitute relegating farmers to second class citizenship.

Under the FmHA program, an applicant is not eligible for disaster assistance unless he or she is able to show that credit cannot be obtained elsewhere. There are farmers and homeowners who have no assets and are not in a position to pay high interest rates but who can obtain credit elsewhere because they have been so diligent, hard-working, and careful to keep their credit rating good. Under the FmHA credit elsewhere test, this applicant is penalized and told to secure the higher interest commercial loan with more stringent repayment provisions or quit; but the person who has not tried to keep a good credit rating receives the advantage of both lower interest rates and better repayment provisions.

Since the SBA only recently started making farm loans and was not geared up for the major disasters of the past year, they were unable to process farm loans as fast as they should be able to do so hereafter. However, in spite of the fact they were thrown into the business so fast, in most cases they have been able to process the loans faster than FmHA and in the future will certainly be able to do so. The timeliness of the approval of financial assistance is a very important matter in recovering from a disaster. The SBA was given this disaster program responsibility so that it could permanently gear up with a reserve of available temporary employees and a permanent cadre which could spring into action quickly in the event of a disaster.

If we return to the situation where agricultural producers are again excluded from the regular disaster loan program, the SBA will still move into the area when a disaster occurs. SBA will provide financial assistance in the case of a hurricane or flood or other disaster to the homeowner in town, to the tavern owner, to the gasoline service station, to the fertilizer dealer, to the local trucker who hauls farm produce; to the elevator operator who buys grain, and to the processor of farm products, but, when the businessman or businesswoman or partners who happen to produce agricultural goods seek the same help, they will in effect be told—"sorry, you are merely a farm producer; you are a second class citizen; you are limited to the FmHA program; unless you have a bad credit rating, you probably won't qualify." In many or most cases, the net effect of this would be to tell agricultural producers that they cannot receive a loan regardless of their losses. This would be an intolerable situation.

(C) CAPITAL FOR PROGRAM

Funding for the Small Business Administration's natural disaster assistance programs has always presented problems. The Farmers Home Administration operates a disaster or emergency loan program to provide assistance to agricultural producers who incur damage or destruction from natural disasters. The Farmers Home Administration, however, obtains capital to operate the program by issuing and selling notes to the Secretary of the Treasury. This assures that there will always be adequate, but not unneeded, capital in the program as it is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to predict capital needs if financed by appropriated funds as no one knows when disasters will occur or their magnitude. SBA in the operation of its disaster loan program has similar problems and has the same need for authority to permit it to finance the program through the issuance and sale of notes to the Treasury.

By acquiring and retaining only such capital as needed to operate the disaster loan fund, the process would be greatly simplified and money would be available to handle these unpredictable emergencies without a special session or special action by the Congress.

II—AUTHORIZATIONS AND LIMITATIONS

Prior to October 1, 1977, the Small Business Act authorized the appropriation of such sums as were necessary to carry out the provisions and purposes of the act; and the Small Business Investment Act authorized the appropriation of specific cumulative dollar amounts to carry out the programs authorized by that act. Effective October 1, 1977, open-ended authorizations for programs and payments of salaries and expenses were sharply curtailed. H.R. 692 (Public Law 95–89) amended the Small Business Act to specifically authorize the dollar amount of program levels by fiscal year for fiscal year 1978 and 1979; to authorize the appropriation of the dollar amount needed to carry out the program levels specified; and to authorize the appropriation of amounts necessary to carry out Small Business Act programs for which specific dollar authorizations are not provided. As fiscal year 1979 ends October 1, 1978, it is now necessary to provide authorizations for periods beyond fiscal year 1979. We believe that 3-year authorizations are the proper approach, giving Congress, the Executive, and the small business community a clear indication of goals and priorities for a reasonable period of time.

The committee, in its recommendation to the Budget Committee, specified for fiscal year 1979 a needed program level of $4.193 billion for SBA's business loan and investment fund, $2 billion for the surety bond guarantee program $100 million for pollution control bond guarantees, and $1.7 billion for physical and non-physical disaster loans. It should be emphasized, however, that these are program lepels and are primarily composed of guaranteed loans, most of which will be repaid. Thus the cost to the Federal Government is only a fraction of this amount. The committee projection indicates a need for approximately a 10-percent per year increase in these program levels and also SBA salaries and expense levels through fiscal year 1982, and the authorizations in H.R. 11445 so provide.

III—MANAGEMENT AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

The small business sector is encountering major economic difficulties. For example: 400,000 small concerns cease doing business each year; small businesses' total share of commercial and industrial assets has dropped from 50 percent in 1960 to 30 percent in 1972; the share of business profits of independent concerns has fallen from 41 percent in 1960 to 25 percent in 1972; and only 44 percent of those small companies started survive their first 2 years of operation.

Testimony, letters and conversation with small business owners and managers blame these statistical declines on: increasing Federal, State and local regulatory burdens, continuing economic uncertainty coupled with inflationary pressures and high cost of money, lack of easily accessible and sophisticated management counseling, energy shortages, tax disadvantages and inequities, increasing industrial concentration, foreign competition, and rapidly advancing technology.

Small firms lack the resources of large corporations' sophisticated inhouse specialists in accounting, finance, marketing, and other such areas. These same small firms also are unable economically to retain expensive outside consultants. The Small Business Administration's management and technical assistance is employed to assist those companies which are client-borrowers. Independent small business entrepreneurs are forced, however, to confront the overwhelming complexities of the marketplace alone.

The small business development centers would meet the need for management and technical assistance. Small business firms would have locally available, expert resources to help them with a multiplicity of diverse business problems. These services would be provided through an extension-service type delivery system utilizing the resources of public and private colleges, universities, community colleges, and consulting groups and firms located throughout each State.

SBA provided $350,000 for fiscal year 1977 as seed money, for eight centers on a pilot project basis and expanded this "seed money" to $2.25 million in fiscal year 1979. These funds cover only a very small portion of each center's actual and projected operating costs.

IV—WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON SMALL BUSINESS

It is absolutely essential that the Federal Government make every effort to assess the present and future needs of the vital small business sector of our economy. Previous Government efforts and "task force approaches" have proved inadequate and undercapitalized. A major effort is called for to increase public awareness of the essential contribution of small business; to identify the problems of small business, including new, small, and family enterprises; to examine the status of minorities and women as small business owners; and to develop specific and comprehensive recommendations for executive and legislative action as may be necessary.

V—MISCELLANEOUS AMENDMENTS

(A) SMALL BUSINESS DATA SENT DIRECT TO CONGRESS

Over the years the loan and other assistance programs of the Small Business Administration have grown significantly. Congress also expects the agency to act as an advocate of small businesses' interest throughout the Federal Government. This increased responsibility which Congress has given SBA often has been thwarted by the intervention of the Office of Management and Budget and the concerns of larger Federal agencies and departments expressed through OMB.

The committee has been concerned to find out SBA's own best judgment as to the number of dollars and employees needed to carry out the programs which Congress mandates. For example, we recently learned that for fiscal year 1979 SBA requested an additional, 1,124 employees but OMB only approved 128 new positions. Although we may not necessarily agree with SBA's request, we do need to know of their views and best judgments on their needs.

While it always appreciates the administration or OMB view, the Congress also wants and needs an unfiltered SBA "small business" analysis and position on many pieces of legislation. The administration "clearance" process for budget data and legislative positions is, at best, slow and cumbersome for a small, independent agency like SBA.

A direct line of communication between SBA and Congress will facilitate the committee's job of watchdog for small business interests.

(B) PRODUCT DISASTER LOANS

In order to assist small businesses whose product has been determined to be unfit for human consumption due to disease or toxicity occurring in such product through natural or undetermined causes, SBA provides loan assistance.

Questions have arisen over interpretation of the words "undetermined causes" and a strict construction of this phrase could lead to a denial of eligibility where the cause was "known" but beyond the ability of the small business to control. For example, the U.S. Department of Agriculture is considering a ban on the use of nitrates by meat processors. If such a ban were to be imposed, meat so treated would be unfit for human consumption and the meat processor would suffer substantial losses in product on-hand; however, the processor might be found ineligible for loan assistance because of the contamination was known.

The eligibility of small businesses for product disaster loans should be clarified to assure that those who suffer substantial economic injury as a result of being unable to process or market a product due to disease or toxicity in the product, are eligible for SBA loan assistance.

MAJOR PROVISIONS

I—AMENDMENTS TO SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION DISASTER LOAN AUTHORITY

(A) INTEREST RATES

For natural disasters occurring between October 1, 1978, and October 1, 1982, the interest rate to homeowners for natural disaster loans would be continued at 1 percent on the first $10,000 and 3 percent on the next $30,000. For all other disaster victims, the interest rate would be set at 5 percent on the first $250,000 and, as before, would be 6⅝ percent above these special ceilings.

The 5-percent rate on loans to all natural disaster victims other than homeowners would be applied prospectively to loans granted as a result of a disaster occurring on or after October 1, 1978; and it would equal the interest rate recommended by the House and Senate Agriculture Committees for the Farmers Home Administration disaster or emergency loan program.

(B) CAPITAL

SBA would be authorized to issue and sell notes to the Secretary of the Treasury in order to obtain capital for its disaster loan fund. This would give SBA the same authority FmHA now uses to finance its disaster or emergency loan program.

(C) ECONOMIC INJURY AS A RESULT OF ENERGY SHORTAGES

Energy shortage loan assistance would be made available to victims of a shortage of any energy source, not just to those small businesses which in 1973 suffered economic injury due to their inability to obtain fuel oil during the oil embargo.

II—AUTHORIZATIONS AND LIMITATIONS

SMALL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT CENTER FISCAL YEAR 1979 AUTHORIZATION

(A) SMALL BUSINESS DATA BASE

One million dollars would be authorized to establish a small business data base. It is anticipated that the list of basic data may be developed partially by utilizing existing Government and private sources but probably will require additional independent research and compilation by SBA. Such a data base would include pertinent information on the small business such as its name and address, type of business, number of employees, and so forth. This information could then be used by SBA to selectively communicate with the small business community as to programs which might help the small business or to advise it of proposed regulations and solicit small business input.

(B) PROGRAM LEVELS

This bill would also authorize the following SBA program levels for fiscal years 1980–82:

	Fiscal year—
	1980	1981	1982
7(a) Business	4,125	4,545	5,000
Direct	495	545	600
Guaranteed	3,630	4,000	4,400
7(h) Handicapped	33	37	42
Direct and IP	22	25	28
Guaranteed	11	12	14
7(i) EOL	166	184	204
Direct and IP	73	81	90
Guaranteed	93	103	114
Development Co	96	106	118
Direct and IP	50	55	61
Guaranteed	46	51	57

	Fiscal year—
	1980	1981	1982
Investment Co. Asst.	163	180	199
Direct	25	28	31
Guaranteed	138	152	168
7(d) Small business development centers	65.0	70.0	75.0
Total BLIF	4,648	5,122	5,638
Direct and IP	730	804	885
Guaranteed	3,918	4,318	4,753
Disaster:
Physical	Open ended
Nonphysical	220	242	267
Surety bond guarantees (SBA share of program level)	2,200	2,420	2,662
Pollution control bond guarantees	100	110	125

In order to support the above program levels the bill would authorize the appropriation of $1.4 billion in fiscal year 1980, $1.5 billion in fiscal year 1981, and $1.7 billion in fiscal year 1982 (1979 authorization is $1.4 billion).

The bill would also authorize salaries and expenses for fiscal year 1980–82 in the amount of $191 million, $211 million and $231 million, respectively (fiscal year 1979 is $188 million).

III—MANAGEMENT AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

SBA's present pilot program for small business development centers would be expanded into a national program allowing all States to participate.

The bill would authorize SBA to make matching grants through a small business development center program. If fully implemented, the program would be funded at a maximum of $60 million in fiscal year 1979 and receive an increase of $5 million per year in fiscal year 1980, fiscal year 1981, and fiscal year 1982 to cover inflation. Grant applicants would be required to obtain matching funds on a 50–50 bases from non-Federal sources and would be entitled to a maximum based on the percent of the population in the United States. The grant recipients would provide management, technical, and technological assistance to small business concerns.

IV—WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON SMALL BUSINESS

The President would be authorized to convent a White House Conference on Small Business to be held before 1981. The planning for the conference would be done by a national conference planning council consisting of 15 members appointed by the President. The council would also be required to submit a report on the conference no later than 180 days after the conference was held. State conferences would be held prior to the White House conference with Federal funds being authorized to defray the expenses of the State conferences. The total cost of the conference is estimated to be $3 million.

(A) SMALL BUSINESS DATA SENT DIRECT TO CONGRESS

Whenever the Small Business Administration submits to the President or the Office of Management and Budget any budget estimate or request, any legislative recommendation or testimony, or comments on legislation, the administration would be directed to concurrently submit copies thereof to the Committees on Small Business of the House and Senate.

VI—COST

The cost of this bill is estimated at a maximum of $2.65 billion through fiscal year 1983; however, since the bill provides SBA funding for fiscal years 1980–82, this represents an average annual cost to operate all SBA programs except physical disaster loans of $837.8 million. In addition, the cost of the natural disaster loan program is estimated at $23 million for each $100 million in loans.

It should be noted, however, that the bulk of these costs is due to possible ultimate losses on loans and guarantees of loans or other obligations and is premised upon SBA operating its programs at the maximum level authorized by law. Historically, SBA has not operated its programs at the maximum level and thus the above costs are overstated. Possible losses due to claims and loan defaults do not occur in the year in which the guarantee was made or the loan disbursed, but rather occur in subsequent years, possibly beyond 1983.

In addition, the above cost estimates do not take into consideration other inherent factors. For example, SBA loans are oftentimes used to create new jobs in the recipient's business and to expand the business. This, naturally, will result in additional tax revenue being received by the Federal, State and local governments.

CONCLUSION

This bill is the result of extensive hearings conducted by the committee and incorporates the provisions of some 30 bills. It was considered by your committee and was unanimously ordered favorably reported to the House by a recorded vote of 28 yeas to no nays.

We believe that the provisions of this encompassing bill are needed by the Nation's small businesses if a climate is to be provided in which they may prosper; and especially to reverse recent trends which show that some 400,000 small concerns cease doing business each year; that small businesses' share of commercial and industrial assets has dropped from 50 percent in 1960 to 30 percent in 1972; that the share of business profits of independent concerns has fallen from 41 percent in 1960 to 25 percent in 1972; and, that only 44 percent of those small companies started their first 2 years of operation.

I believe that this bill represents a reasonable, adequate and inexpensive means of helping small business throughout the Nation; and that the development of viable small businesses as a source of goods and services to both private industry and to the Federal, State, and local governments will provide an increase in competition and result in lower prices to these purchasers.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in wholehearted support of this bill H.R. 11445 and to urge its passage. It was reported by our committee by a unanimous, recorded vote of 28 to 0; and I hope it will be overwhelmingly approved by this body.

There is nothing partisan about this bill. It represents a continuation of the congressional control over SBA and its programs which this Congress belatedly, but thankfully, approved with the enactment of Public Law 95–89.

Prior to enactment of Public Law 95–89 (H.R. 692) there were no congressionally established program levels or line-items for SBA's activities. The only legislative control over SBA consisted of vague ceilings on the amount of loans and guarantees in the Agency's active portfolio. Thus, it was impossible for our Committee, the Appropriations Committee, or the Congress to predict or to mandate just how the administration would establish priorities. The small business community had absolutely no idea what to expect from its Agency.

The chairman of our Committee, NEAL SMITH of Iowa, I and the entire Committee on Small Business worked hard to correct all of this through the legislative reforms embodied in Public Law 95–89. This body approved our initiatives. We established annual program levels of operation and we line-itemed the authorizations for fiscal years 1978 and 1979.

I am pleased to report, Mr. Speaker, that our hearings have determined that the reforms are working—and working well. With the exception of the regular 7(a) direct loan program, SBA is operating very close to the targets we set and the Agency has told us that this marksmanship will continue through fiscal year 1979. More importantly, the SBA administrator was able to tell us that no eligible small business applicants were being turned away because of a lack of authorizations or funding—again, with the exception of the regular direct loan program.

Consequently, in this bill we are extending our line-item approach to cover fiscal years 1980 through 1982. The bill increases various program levels by 10 percent for each of these 3 fiscal years. At hearings on March 1, the SBA administrator told us that these annual increases might prove to be too low if substantial changes are made in SBA's operations. Because our committee does not envision or mandate substantial changes, we adopted the 10-percent annual increase figure.

I would like to emphasize that, because SBA is well below our target for the regular direct loan program and well below the demand for these loans, we are sticking to our original targets with a 10-percent annual increase. It is not our intent to have SBA competing with the banks in this area; but we have heard testimony over and over again to the effect that banks are not interested in making small business loans in amounts under $100,000. So the small businessman has no place to go, despite his credit worthiness, except to SBA. If SBA responds as we ask it to do in this bill, there will be no competition with the banks.

With regard to the disaster loan provisions of this bill, I would like to emphasize that the interest rate to homeowners remains the same as it is under current law. We have provided for a 5-percent disaster loan interest rate to businesses. The rate on these loans is now an overly generous 3 percent, but, in the absence of this bill, it would increase to 6⅝ of 1 percent on October 1 of this year.

Mr. Speaker, this is, in my opinion, a responsive and responsible bill. It represents the product of several days of hearings, discussions, and consideration of over 30 bills that were referred to our committee. I urge its overwhelming, if not unanimous, passage.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. LAFALCE).

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the chairman of the full committee would answer a few questions?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LAFALCE. First, it is my understanding that there was some parliamentary difficulty with the bill because it might exceed the budget authorizations.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The Budget Committee asked that three amendments be provided, and they have been provided in the motion. The Budget Committee problem has been taken care of.

Mr. LAFALCE. What motion?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, as amended, includes the three amendments that the Budget Committee wanted. So there is no Budget Committee problem now.

Mr. LAFALCE. What were those three amendments that were part of one amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. This is the normal procedure that is used to meet the Budget Committee objections.

The first amendment requires that there be an appropriation for borrowing authority.

The second one provides that none of the travel and expenses could be out of this fiscal year's appropriation. It is only to the extent that such amounts are provided in advance in appropriation acts.

The third one had to do with a coal problem in Indiana. The agency has already put out regulations which I understand cures that. But we have provided in here that that provision, insofar as it violates the Budget Act, would be changed. So there is no Budget Act problem.

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. Speaker, when this bill came before the full committee we did not have the benefit of a final letter from the administration regarding their disposition on it. We did have a draft of a letter, but it was pretty much demeaned because of the fact that it was a draft. However, subsequent to the time that the full committee approved this bill, the Office of Management and Budget did send a letter, which I included in my additional remarks, in which, on behalf of the administration, they indicated that the administration is opposed to the enactment of this bill. That is on page 41 of the committee report, if anybody would like to read it.

Mr. Speaker, I thought that we were going to have our day in court on this bill, that we would be able to come forth and offer amendments to it which would take care of the problems and that the administration had. I thought we would be able to come forth on this floor and offer amendments that would take care of difficulties that individual Members had. In fact, I think some Members voted for final passage in committee with the understanding that they would be able to have their day in court, offer their amendments on the floor of the House, and have the will of the Congress decide it on the specific issues—issues which the administration happens to feel very strongly about also. And so I feel that it is imperative, if we are going to deal in good faith with this administration, to oppose this bill at this time on the Suspension Calendar, so that we can come back here at the end of this week, or next week, and offer those amendments which will take care of the tremendous problems that the administration has.

For example, I do not think the Members of this body know that we are going off budget with the disaster loan program. We are circumventing whatever budgetary problems we have; we are not dealing with them directly, but simply going off budget. The administration is vehemently opposed to that.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the Members, if they wish to be fiscally responsible, to vote "no" at this time, since the bill is on the Suspension Calendar, with the thought in mind that we will have an opportunity, when the bill comes before us for final passage on the regular calendar, to amend it and take care of some of its defects.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. BALDUS).

Mr. BALDUS. Mr. Speaker, the need for the Small Business Development Center provisions of bill H.R. 11445 arises out of the need of small business for increased management assistance. Of every 10 small business firms which start each year, only 1 will be in operation 5 years later. The Business Failure Record, published by Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., reports that more than 93 percent of all business failures are due to managerial weaknesses and deficiencies.

The Small Business Administration (SBA) is almost strictly a lending agency, with very little of its current resources going to management assistance.

Title III of Bill H.R. 11445 provides authority for SBA to establish Small Business Development Centers at cooperating universities around the country, to assist small business with their management assistance problems. These centers will operate on an outreach basis, sending help to small businesses in the form of specialists competent in the areas of inventory, marketing, cost control, and so on. In addition, these centers will develop, through their contacts with small businesspersons, a body of research and data on the problems and potentials of small business that is not currently available.

There is a striking similarity of this landmark legislation to the Agriculture Extension Service, and the historic contribution it has made to farmers. At the beginning of the century, farms were very small; farmers were untrained in operations and management, and had little or no experience with chemical fertilizers. All our modern machinery technology, processes and materials had yet to be developed, and before radio, farmers had almost no access to market information. The creation of the land-grant colleges, and the Agriculture Extension Service which it fostered, changed all that in the short period of 40 years. Now, when a farmer has trouble with his soil he can send a soil sample to the university and get help; if he has a disease among his cattle, he can obtain analyses and treatment from the extension services; he can obtain operational assistance in the same way.

Senator GAYLORD NELSON, of Wisconsin, author of a similar measure already passed in the Senate, has said that "We owe small business at least as much as we owe small farmers." I agree.

I believe Senator NELSON'S statement summarizes succinctly why this legislation has received such immediate and widespread support. The time for this legislation, which would have the effect of creating an extension service for small business, similar to the one already existing for agriculture, has come.

Hundreds of letters have come to the committee and to my office in support of the bill. Many of these letters are from small business persons who actually benefited from the services of the university business development centers currently operating under SBA contract on a pilot basis. For instance, one small businessman wrote that a team of students helped him develop an excellent cost accounting system for the company that is in effect today. He wrote of the program, that:

> Tied into the SBA loan program, it can give the government more "Bang for the Buck," than any other program I know of. . . .

On August 5, 1977, the Senate passed S. 972, after an extensive set of hearings before the Senate Small Business Committee. S. 972 is the companion bill to the SBDC provisions of H.R. 11445, testifying in favor of the bill were a great many small business national associations, including the National Small Business Association, the Smaller Business Association of New England, and the National Association of Small Business Investment Companies.

Most persuasive, however, was the testimony of small businessmen who actually received the services of the universities which offer management assistance. These were satisfied customers, so to speak.

Cornell Adams, Accurate Set, Inc., Paterson, N.J., testified that he received a variety of assistance, including financial expertise, product liability insurance guidance, marketing, packaging and promotion help, aid with a trademark problem, a direct loan, the continuing services of students of Rutgers for the first 5 years of the business life, trade information and other services. Adams, who strongly urged passage of the Senate bill, said of these services:

Without the assistance received from Rutgers, this company could not have survived.

Lester Biddle, president of Mircom Corp., in Panama City, Fla., commenting on his two experiences with the University of Northwest Florida UBDC, and his intention to go back to them a third time, said:

For the small amount of time that (the small businessman) spends with his students, the return on the investment of his time can save his business . . .

From my own State of Wisconsin, Mr. Robert Keyes, president of Greenwood Homes, Inc., in Greenwood, testified about his experience with the Northern Wisconsin Development Center at Wausau, part of the University of Wisconsin Extension. Mr. Keyes testified:

I am convinced that we would not be in business today if we had not been able to use their advisory services over the years.

The SBA has operated experimental Small Business Development Centers for several years now. Results show that this pilot program, even with limited funding and personnel, has been extremely successful. In a random sample of 300 small businessmen who used the services of these participating universities, 90 percent said they were better able to identify their problems as a result of the service; 77 percent made changes in their business as a result of it; 70 percent said they increased sales; 64 percent said they increased profits; 60 percent reduced the cost of doing business, and 27 percent said they increased the number of their employees.

In short, I do not think there is any doubt that universities can work together with small businesspersons to provide effective management assistance.

These pilot programs have struggled long enough on too limited resources and volunteer help. Now is the time to write assistance for these struggling small businesses into law.

Title III and other provisions of H.R. 11445 make specific provisions for the following:

A 4-year authorization for Small Business Development Center programs;

Sixty million dollars the first year, to be distributed in the form of grants, increased by $5 million each succeeding year, for a total of $270 million over 4 years;

A 50-percent State and local match requirement;

State, universities, or other qualified organizations as grantees; and

A population ratio distribution formula, by which States with greater populations will receive a proportionate share of the funds.

These provisions are similar in purpose, scope, and concept to H.R. 5754, the Small Business Development Center Act, which I introduced a year ago, and which 81 of my colleagues have cosponsored. I wish to commend Chairman SMITH for the work of his subcommittee and committee in incorporating the Small Business Development Center Act into his omnibus small business bill, H.R. 11445.

I urge my colleagues to support the Small Business Development Center Act today by voting for the small business omnibus bill, H.R. 11445.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GARY A. MYERS).

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask the chairman a few questions.

I, too, have concern about the bill being on the floor under the suspension rules.

I have that concern for a couple of reasons. One reason is that, as I understand, we are raising the interest rate for disaster loans; and I take it that that is a debatable issue with some Members of the House who think that we ought to be able to have some sort of input in that respect.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about the so-called management of the small business development centers growing from what I understand would be a kind of pilot project to a $60 million a year commitment. I am not sure that most Members of the House have adequately developed an attitude about whether or not, under the proposals of the bill, this is an appropriate way in which to approach this subject.

I have concern that if we structure it in such a way that money flows essentially through educational facilities, universities, and so forth, the program might be one more to the benefit of the education community than it is to small businessmen. Personally, I believe that some small businessmen, who may have rather routine problems of inventory, cash flow, and so forth, might not get the attention that they need compared to and in competition with some small business people who have very exotic applications of new social theories, electronic data equipment and so forth, and that the universities might go for those exotic types of business opportunities rather than to have concern about the routine problems of the small businessman who does not have an adequate grasp of his inventory, does not have an adequate cash flow, and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask the chairman this question: Are there, in the opinion of the chairman, enough safeguards here to guarantee that the $60 million we are being asked to provide for that program will be for the benefit of small business people with traditional small business problems rather than for the benefit of the education community, because if it goes to the education community, I think we ought to fund it in some other way, not through the SBA?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Speaker, first, with regard to his first question relative to interest rates, I want to point out that we did have that provision on the floor last fall; and although it did not get a two-thirds vote at that time, there was an opportunity to debate the issue thoroughly and more than a majority did vote for it. Therefore, I think that there has been a chance in this Congress to resolve that question in favor of what we did in this bill.

Secondly, with regard to the small business development center program, they presently have an authorization and are providing money to universities to do this very thing under some pilot programs, with no guidelines, so what we have tried to do here is to at least establish some guidelines for the additional ones to be created and the ones in existence, rather than to leave them with no guidelines whatever.

They have requested in this year's budget some additional money, about $1.5 million, I think, indicating that the administration supports expanding the existing program. However, they have no guidelines, so I thought what we were doing here primarily was to try to establish guidelines under which they will proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Now, I think there is a possibility that some university would try to use it as aid to education. However, we do provide a program whereby there will be authorization to grant these applications, and certainly we will try to ride herd on it to make sure that they serve the small business community. We are not interested in just aid to education. We want to help small business.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. My concern is that I do not know many small businessmen who, if the project fails and they lose their businesses, will have confidence in having a student who simply loses about three grade levels—that will be receptive to that type of help. If we had an experienced business person, instead of students, and if he needed help from a university he could coordinate that activity, that is my concern. Some universities have this program. They have selected out applications of new technology, which is not in the interests of many small business people.

I thank the gentleman for his response and I hope the committee, if this should pass in its present form, would make efforts to continue to see that it does not go the way of the education community. I think there is good reason for having programs in the education community aside from this.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I want to say that we did have plenty of testimony that they are not using it now just as an education support program and are holding adult education seminars, and in some instances going right down the main street of the little town and getting the man and helping him in his management sometimes, and trying to help him in his problems.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana Mr. QUAYLE).

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to speak in favor of the bill and to express my appreciation to the distinguished chairman of the committee, and also to the distinguished ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE), in helping clarify language in section 7(b)(8). As we all know, this language dealt with energy-related shortages, and in particular we are talking about the coal strike and how it affected small business.

The language now inserted into the bill not only clarifies the intent, I think, that Congress had—and I really appreciate the chairman of the committee and ranking minority member of the committee helping me in talking with the Small Business Administrator, Mr. Weaver, in coming to a reasonable conclusion on who would and who would not be eligible for loans under this section, where they are affected by the strike.

The language in the bill does go directly to the question of certain technicalities, as the chairman is well aware. The effective date is not until October 1978, but this does not mean that anything should change, particularly what SBA has already interpreted to be in effect as the law passed in 1974.

I just ask my distinguished chairman if I am not correct, since SBA has already agreed to this, that there should be no reason for any change in procedure just because of a technicality.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman is quite correct in everything he said. We are making this amendment because of technical changes of requirements of the House rules. We had not intended to change the law. We were only clarifying what was originally intended by this Congress, so removing those, as required by the House rules, should not be interpreted by the administration as meaning that we think they ought to change the interpretation previously given.

Mr. QUAYLE. I thank my distinguished chairman, and also the gentleman from Massachusetts, because it really was just clarifying what the intent of Congress was.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUAYLE. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONTE. The gentleman from Indiana is absolutely right. I was the author of that law, and certainly that was our intent. By this committee amendment, we do not intend to change that intent.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would like to say this is just cooperation with the legislative branch and the executive branch in coming to an agreement. The Administrator has now determined that people affected by a strike should be eligible for loans. This was the intent of the gentleman's amendment in 1974, and I appreciate that he and others have communicated the intent of the Congress in 1974 as it applies in 1978.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. WALKER).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, my remarks regarding H.R. 11445 will be brief and to the point.

Everyone supports proposals which will assist small businesses. It is the small businessman and woman who are the backbone of our free market economy.

My strong support for small businesses requires me to express concern over title III of H.R. 11445. Specifically, my concern over the small business development center program can be summarized by questioning whether every assurance has been provided that the funding intended for small businesses will actually benefit small business.

A great deal of money is at stake here. If it is to be spent wisely and for the benefit of small business, a good working relationship between the academic community and small businesses must be guaranteed. Academicians can assist small business and the small business development center program can be a proper vehicle for that assistance; however, the views of the academic world cannot be allowed to become totally dominant.

Small businesses know best what is needed to make small businesses thrive. The wisdom of the academic world can and should be added to the vast experience and know-how of small businessmen who work every day in the marketplace. However, we must be sure that the views and services of private enterprise are considered first. We must also be sure that, in making it possible for colleges and universities to help small businessmen, we are not creating unfair competition for many small businesses who provide professional expertise of an identical nature.

Presently, my home State of Pennsylvania is providing the kind of example I believe should be followed. The academic world and small business community are working together to assist small business with maximum efficiency.

I would hope this legislation would heed Pennsylvania's example.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, I oppose H.R. 11445, the Small Business Administration Authorization. I do so because I believe Congress must face the real problems confronting America's smaller businesses. The SBA approach to helping small business is misdirected in large part because it deals with the results of those problems and not their true causes. The fundamental problem facing small business in America today is heavy taxation by all levels of government and overregulation by the Federal Government. SBA does not deal with this problem.

The primary barrier to small business today is the tax barrier—in particular, excessively heavy taxation of capital gains. This hurts small business in two ways: it makes it difficult to raise capital and then punishes success when an entrepreneur manages to overcome this and other obstacles.

Recently, the American Electronics Association, an organization comprised primarily of small, high technology, capital-intensive businesses, presented dramatic evidence of the effects of excessive capital gains taxes. An AEA survey shows that prior to 1969, when the minimum tax on capital gains was 25 percent, small new electronic companies were able to raise, on average, $1.2 million, for firms founded between 1966 and 1970. Since 1969, following an increase in capital gains taxes, however, these firms have been able to raise only $345,000, on the average.

This reduction in available capital, which results from a reduction in the reward for risk and then translates directly in to the inability of small business in general to raise equity funds, has seriously hurt not only the expansion of jobs but Government revenues as well. The fact is that most jobs are created by small business. Yet the AEA survey shows conclusively that the increase in employment in the electronics industry has fallen off dramatically since 1970. As a direct consequence, tax revenue growth—individual, corporate and capital gains tax revenue—has fallen off. Thus the AEA concludes that elimination of the capital gains taxation—which raises only $7 billion per year for the Federal Government—would increase Government revenues.

This conclusion about the revenue effect of eliminating capital gains taxes has been confirmed in a study by Data Resources, Inc. for the Securities Industry Association. This study concluded that an elimination of capital gains taxation would increase Federal revenues $38 billion by 1982, create 3 million jobs and $171 billion in gross national product. That is what small business really needs. It is also what the work force, consumers, and the economy in general need.

For this reason I believe that an effective small business revitalization program must concentrate on lowering taxes. For my own part I have offered the Tax Reduction Act, which would reduce the maximum tax on capital gains from the present 35 to 25 percent, by reducing the top personal income tax rate from 70 to 50 percent. It would also increase the corporate surtax exemption to $100,000—of great importance to many smaller businesses—and lower the corporate normal tax rate by 3 percentage points. This means that under my program any company earning $100,000 per year or less would be subject to a maximum corporate tax rate of 19 percent. This bill would also reduce personal income taxes, across-the-board, by 30 percent.

In addition, I have proposed legislation which would index capital gains so that inflation would not further increase capital gains taxes, eliminate the double taxation of dividends, and other measures which would do far more to help small business than giving out more Government loans.

Consequently, I must oppose H.R. 11445. There are better ways available to Congress to help smaller businesses, and they are already before our committees. These should be brought forth immediately. Let us give real relief to these businessmen and businesswomen, not more Federal handouts.●

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I cannot support consideration or final passage of H.R. 11445, Small Business Administration authorizations, under suspension of the rules. This bill is a controversial one. Among other provisions it would increase the interest rate on loans to natural disaster victims (other than homeowners) from 3 to 5 percent. The bill may be in violation of the Congressional Budget Act in that it would permit the Small Business Administration to issue and sell notes to the Treasury to obtain capital for the disaster loan fund, a procedure which is tantamount to "backdoor" funding. Moreover this entire bill raises budgetary questions in that it is being brought up under suspension, a procedure which dodges the provisions of the Congressional Budget Act. H.R. 11445 raises serious questions which should be resolved through full and complete House consideration. It should not be rushed through in a procedure that does not permit amendment. Therefore I shall oppose the bill under suspension in the hope that we can come back to this bill later and offer amendments which will take care of some of its defects.●

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 11445, as amended.

COMMENDING U.S. DELEGATION TO BELGRADE MEETING AND URGING CONTINUATION OF PRESIDENTIAL OPPOSITION TO HUMAN RIGHTS VIOLATIONS

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on International Relations be discharged from further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 549) praising the U.S. delegation to the Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe for its efforts on behalf of human rights, and urging the President to continue to express U.S. opposition to repressive actions and to violations of basic human rights which are contrary to the Helsinki accords, and ask for immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 549

Whereas the Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe has now concluded;

Wheras H. Con. Res. 249, adopted June 15, 1977, urged that the Belgrade meeting include the presentation and thorough discussion of all violations of the Helsinki Accords;

Whereas the United States delegation to the Belgrade meeting displayed great determination and resourcefulness in forthrightly expressing the concern of the Congress and people of the United States over specific violations of the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Accords by some of the signatory states, including the Soviet Union and some Eastern European countries; and

Whereas violations of the human rights guaranteed under the Helsinki Accords continue in some signatory states: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the United States delegation to the Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Cooperation and Security in Europe is accorded the gratitude of the Congress for its determination and vigor in demanding a thorough review of compliance with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki accords by the signatory states and for its success in obtaining such a review which brought into the spotlight of world opinion those abuses which were of greatest concern to the Congress and people of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Congress urges the President and other appropriate executive branch officials to continue to express at every suitable opportunity and in the strongest terms the opposition of the United States to repressive actions and to violations of basic human rights which are contrary to the Hensinki accords.

SEC. 3. The Congress urges the President and other appropriate executive branch officials to use every feasible bilateral contact to emphasize to the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries that the solemn commitments given by such countries call for their observance of human rights.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 549, praising the U.S. delegation to the Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe for its efforts on behalf of human rights, and urging the President to continue to express U.S. opposition to repressive actions and to violations of basic human rights which are contrary to the Helsinki accords.

The Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe which began on October 9, 1977, and concluded last month afforded the U.S. delegation, under the able and forcefull leadership of Ambassador Arthur J. Goldberg, an opportunity to point out for the record the lack of compliance with the Helsinki accords on the part of certain signatories, particularly the Soviet Union with respect to human rights.

The signatory countries agreed to meet again in 1980 in order to review implementation of the provisions of the accord. Hopefully, when the Madrid meeting convenes, the human rights situation will have improved. In the meantime, the resolution urges the President and other appropriate executive branch officials to continue to express at every suitable opportunity, and in the strongest terms, the opposition of the United States to repressive actions and to violations of basic human rights which run counter to the promise of the accords.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend and to congratulate the cosponsors of the resolution, the Honorable DANTE B. FASCELL, who chairs the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and the Honorable JOHN BUCHANAN, who is a member of the Commission, and indeed all members of the Commission for their diligent and vigorous oversight efforts with respect to U.S. participation in the Belgrade meeting.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in full support of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the resolution before us represents both a fitting tribute to the outstanding work of our delegation to the Belgrade meeting and a very timely reaffirmation of the commitment of the Congress of the United States to the cause of human rights.

Those of us who like myself have had the opportunity to attend the Belgrade meeting and have followed the course of events there closely are keenly aware of the magnitude of the task that our delegation under the leadership of Justice Arthur Goldberg faced and the determination with which they carried it out. Like the Helsinki accords themselves, the Belgrade meeting was long and complex. Belgrade was a forum in which the often-conflicting views and interests of 35 nations came into play. Included on its agenda were a wide variety of issues whose scope spanned not only human rights and human contacts, but economic and scientific cooperation, cultural exchange, the freer flow of information, and military confidence building measures as well as principles of international relations.

In spite of this complexity and of the sensitivities that made Belgrade a diplomatic minefield, Justice Goldberg showed great skill in getting the full and thorough review of human rights that we in Congress believed was essential. Not only did our delegation keep its sights firmly on target, but it displayed consummate skill in keeping our NATO allies behind us and in winning the sympathy of many of the neutral and nonalined countries for our views.

As a result, Belgrade stands as a monument to the idea that human rights are a legitimate matter of international concern and that the countries that signed the Helsinki Accords owe an accounting for the way they treat their citizens. Thanks to Justice Goldberg's efforts, we can be sure that we will have another opportunity to get such an accounting at the next CSCE review meeting in Madrid in 1980.

As for the second part of the resolution before us, I believe that it is particularly appropriate at this time. The Belgrade meeting is now behind us, but there are disturbing indications that human rights violations are continuing—and perhaps may increase—in some of the states that signed the Helsinki agreement. I think we must make it clear that the commitment of Congress to human rights remains firm and that although the Belgrade meeting may be over, our profound concern for the issues raised there will continue.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the concurrent resolution, and I wish to commend the committee and the chairman of the committee for bringing this resolution to the floor at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 549, and join my colleagues, the distinguished chairman of our House International Relations Committee, Mr. ZABLOCKI, and the chairman of the Committee on Security and Cooperation in Europe, Mr. FASCELL, in praising the efforts of the U.S. delegation to the Belgrade meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

As a congressional advisor to the Conference, I was pleased to have the opportunity of joining Congressman FASCELL and other Members of this body in attending the opening session of the 35-nation review meeting. I can state from personal observations my opinion of the excellent work performed by Ambassador Arthur Goldberg and all members of the United States delegation.

While the overall results of the Conference itself were somewhat disappointing, through a concerted effort by the United States and our western allies, some progress was made. As succinctly stated by the New York Times:

> Western delegates were able, over a period of weeks, to detail the ways in which the Communist governments had failed to live up to their commitments, and the Communist representatives had to listen. Even more important was the agreement to meet again in Madrid.

Despite major efforts to prevent a meaningful discussion of the all important questions concerning human rights, the United States was successful in confronting all participants with the reality that they must answer for their actions. On February 26, 1978, the Washington Post concurred that "the idea was confirmed that the Helsinki signatories are accountable to each other for the way they treat their citizens."

The London Sunday Times also stressed this important recognition in a March 12 editorial:

> At Belgrade, the USSR fought to keep human rights issues off the floor, but the West and neutrals succeeded not only in defeating this, but in turning Belgrade very much into a human rights Conference. To this extent, Belgrade, far from being a walkover for the USSR, was a success for the West. One consequence is that there will be a further occasion for debate and review on human rights in Europe, another meeting is to be held in November 1980 in Madrid.

The resolution before us recognizes this advance and urges the President and any other appropriate executive branch officials to continue to express at every opportunity and in the strongest terms, the opposition of the United States to repressive actions and to violations of basic human rights which run counter to the promise of the accords.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to approve this resolution to show our support for the work that has already been done and to encourage a continuation of what Ambassador Arthur J. Goldberg has termed "a fine example of executive/legislative cooperation in the field of foreign policy."

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the concurrent resolution just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION AND TREATMENT AMENDMENTS OF 1977

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 6693) to amend the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act to extend the authorization of appropriations contained in such act, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and consider the Senate amendments in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That this Act may be cited as the "Adoption Reform Act of 1977".

TITLE I—ADOPTION OPPORTUNITIES

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF PURPOSES

SEC. 101. The Congress hereby finds that many thousands of children remain in institutions or foster homes solely because of legal and other barriers to their placement in permanent, adoptive homes; that the majority of such children are of school age, handicapped, or both; that adoption may be the best alternative for assuring the healthy development of such children; that there are qualified persons seeking to adopt such children who are unable to do so because of barriers to their placement; and that, in order both to enhance the stability and love of the child's home environment and to avoid wasteful expenditures of public funds, such children should not be maintained in foster care or institutions when adoption is appropriate and families for them can be found. It is, therefore, the purpose of this title to facilitate the elimination of barriers to adoption and to provide permanent and loving home environments for children who would benefit by adoption, particularly children with special needs by—

(1) promoting the establishment of model adoption legislation and procedures in the States and territories of the United States in order to eliminate jurisdictional and legal obstacles to adoption;

(2) providing a mechanism for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to (A) promote quality standards for adoption services (including pre-placement, post-placement, and post-adoption counseling and standards to protect the rights of children in need of adoption), and (B) provide for a national adoption and foster care information data gathering and analysis system and a national adoption information exchange system to bring together children who would benefit by adoption and qualified prospective adoptive parents who are seeking such children.

MODEL ADOPTION LEGISLATION AND PROCEDURES

SEC. 102. (a) Not later than eighteen months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") shall issue, based on the recommendations of the panel described in subsection (b) of this section, proposed model adopted legislation and procedures and publish such proposal in the Federal Register for comment. After soliciting and giving due consideration to the comments of interested individuals, groups, and organizations and consulting further with such panel, the Secretary shall issue and publish model adoption legislation and producers which shall not conflict with the provisions of any interstate compact in operation pursuant to which States are making, supervising, or regulating placements of children.

(b)(1) Not later than ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall appoint a panel (hereinafter referred to as the "panel") to be composed of not less than eleven nor more than seventeen members generally representative of public and voluntary organizations, agencies, and persons interested and with expertise and experience in facilitating the achievement of the purposes of this title (including, but not limited to, National, State, and local child welfare organizations, including those representatives of minorities, and adoptive parent organizations). The panel shall (A) review current conditions, practices, and laws relating to adoption, with special reference to their effect on facilitating or impending the location of suitable adoptive homes for children who would benefit by adoption and the completion of suitable adoptions for such children; and (B) not later than twelve months after the date on which the members of the panel have been appointed, propose to the Secretary model (including adoption assistance agreement) legislation and procedures relating to adoption designed to facilitate adoption by families of all economic levels.

(2) The panel shall be terminated thirty days after the Secretary publishes the final model legislation and procedures pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.

(3) Members of the panel, other than those regularly employed by the Federal Government, while serving on business of the panel shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate not in excess of the daily equivalent of the rate payable to a GS-18 employee under section 5322 of title 5, United States Code, including traveltime; and, while so serving away from their homes or regular places of business, they may be allowed travel expenses (including per diem in lieu of subsistence) as authorized by section 5703 of such title for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

(c) The Secretary shall take such steps as he or she deems necessary to encourage and facilitate the enactment in each State of comprehensive adoption assistance legislation and the establishment in each State of the model legislation and procedures published pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.

INFORMATION AND SERVICES

SEC. 103. (a) The Secretary shall establish in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare an appropriate administrative arrangement to provide a centralized focus for planning and coordinating of all departmental activities affecting adoption and foster care and for carrying out the provisions of this title. The Secretary shall make available such consultant services and personnel, together with appropriate administrative expenses, as are necessary for carrying out such purposes.

(b) In connection with carrying out the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary shall—

(1) provide (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies and organizations) for the establishment and operation of a national adoption and foster care data gathering and analysis system utilizing data collected by States pursuant to requirements of law;

(2) conduct (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies or organizations) an education and training program on adoption, and prepare, publish, and disseminate (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies and organizations) to all interested parties, public and private agencies and organizations (including, but not limited to, hospitals, health care and family planning clinics, and social services agencies), and governmental bodies, information and education and training materials regarding adoption and adoption assistance programs;

(3) notwithstanding any other provision of law, provide (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies or organizations) for (A) the operation of a national adoption information exchange system (including only such information as is necessary to facilitate the adoptive placement of children, utilizing computers and data processing methods to assist in the location of children who would benefit by adoption and in the placement in adoptive homes of children awaiting adoption) and (B) the coordination of such system with similar State and regional systems;

(4) provide (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies or organizations, including parent groups) for the provision of technical assistance in the planning, improving, developing, and carrying out of programs and activities relating to adoption; and

(5) consult with other appropriate Federal departments and agencies in order to promote maximum coordination of the services and benefits provided under programs carried out by such departments and agencies with those carried out by the Secretary, and provide for the coordination of such aspects of all programs within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to adoption.

Mr. BRADEMAS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS) explain why it is necessary that we do this by unanimous consent?

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, this is the customary procedure with measures of this kind, particularly where unanimity of opinion has been reached on both sides of the aisle with respect to the substance of the bill.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, can the gentleman inform us as to whether there are many differences between the Senate and the House versions?

Mr. BRADEMAS. There are several differences between the bills as passed by the House and the other body. The agreement to consider on which I have asked unanimous consent reflects the produce of our negotiations, and I think it is fair to say that the agreement represents agreement with the position of the House in most respects.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, the gentleman has stated that there are major substantial differences. Could he explain briefly what they are?

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I will be very glad to explain.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to report to the House that after negotiations between the Committee on Human Resources of the other body and the Committee on Education and Labor on H.R. 6693, the child abuse prevention and treatment amendments, we have reached a compromise agreement.

Mr. Speaker, I want first to express appreciation for the efforts of the members of the committee who have worked and cooperated in bringing this matter to a successful resolution.

In particular, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the distinguished chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, Mr. PERKINS, and the distinguished ranking minority member, Mr. QUIE, for their help in bringing this measure before you today. Let me also thank Mr. BIAGGI, Mr. MILLER, and Mr. KILDEE for their contributions. I would also like to thank the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Select Education, Mr. JEFFORDS, as well as the other members of the subcommittee for their efforts on this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not also thank the Members from the other body for their contributions, in particular the major sponsor of the bill there, the distinguished senior Senator from California, Mr. CRANSTON.

Mr. Speaker, let me make these brief observations, The agreement is similar in many respects to the bill passed by the House on September 26, 1977, by a vote of 375 to 12. The House bill was ordered reported by the Subcommittee on Select Education, which I have the honor to chair, by a unanimous bipartisan vote. Further, the bill was reported from the Education and Labor Committee, again unanimously.

AUTHORIZATIONS

The compromise measure extends for 4 more years—1 year less than the House bill—the authorizations for Public Law 93-247, the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, and strengthens the programs of research and prevention and treatment of child abuse supported by the act.

The authorization of appropriations agreed to are those figures authorized by the House bill: $25 million for fiscal year 1978, $27.5 million for fiscal year 1979, and $30 million each for fiscal years 1980 and 1981.

RESEARCH ACTIVITIES OF THE NATIONAL CENTER ON CHILD ABUSE AND NEGLECT

Let me describe briefly, Mr. Speaker, how the agreement would strengthen the research activities of the National Center on Child Abuse and Neglect. The measure would require the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to establish research priorities for making grants under the act, and that research grants could be made for periods up to 3 years with an annual peer review to assure the quality of the research conducted under the grants. These provisions were contained, Mr. Speaker, in the House bill.

SERVICE PROGRAMS AND PROJECTS

In order to allow the funding of direct, ongoing programs in child abuse prevention and treatment, the House bill added service programs to the demonstration program authority of Public Law 93-247, and the Senate bill provided for special consideration to be given to continued funding of programs of demonstrated effectiveness. The compromise agreement incorporates both these provisions.

GRANTS TO THE STATES

Let me now, Mr. Speaker, describe the changes proposed in the program of grants to the States for child abuse projects.

The level of funds allocated to the States for assisting child abuse prevention and treatment programs is now set by Public Law 93-247 at a maximum of 20 percent of the appropriated funds. The House bill provided that not less than 30 percent of appropriated funds should go to State programs while the Senate bill provided that a minimum of 20 percent of the funds should be used for the State grant program.

The compromise agreement, Mr. Speaker, provides that not less than 25 percent of the funds appropriated for each of fiscal years 1978 and 1979 should be used for the State grants and not less than 30 percent for each of the fiscal years 1980 and 1981.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the compromise agreement would require a reduction in grants awarded to a State which fails to obligate funds within 18 months after their award.

SEXUAL ABUSE TREATMENT PROGRAMS

The House bill, Mr. Speaker, expanded the definition of child abuse in the act to include "sexual exploitation," underscoring the need to provide treatment to children who have been sexually abused and to prevent this form of abuse. The compromise agreement contains the House language.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the House bill provided for the establishment of centers for provision of treatment and other services to sexually abused children and those who commit sexual abuse against children, with appropriations set at such sums as may be necessary.

Similarly, the Senate bill provided for grants to support programs to prevent, identify and treat sexual abuse of children, and authorized $2 million each for fiscal years 1978 and 1979 for these programs.

The compromise agreement would authorize appropriations of $3 million for fiscal year 1978, $3.5 million for fiscal year 1979, and $4 million each for fiscal years 1980 and 1981 to provide for programs to treat sexual abuse of children, including programs involving the treatment of family units and persons who have committed acts of sexual abuse.

The House bill, Mr. Speaker, also contained a provision establishing criminal penalties for the sexual exploitation of children. The Senate bill extending the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act contained no comparable provision, nor does the compromise agreement.

I should point out, however, Mr. Speaker, that legislation similar to the House provision in H.R. 6693 providing criminal penalties for the sexual exploitation of children passed both the House and Senate, as reported from the Judiciary Committees in both Chambers, and was signed into law on February 6, 1978.

ADOPTION REFORM

Mr. Speaker, let me briefly describe one further provision of the compromise agreement on H.R. 6693.

The Senate measure authorized appropriations of $5 million each for fiscal years 1978 through 1981 to establish within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a program to facilitate the adoption of children.

An advisory panel would be formed to develop model adoption legislation and procedures to ease the interstate adoption of children. A national adoption information exchange system would be established and all activities within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare affecting adoption and foster care would be coordinated.

The Senate measure would also provide for a study of the nature and effects of the interstate placement of children in adoptive homes by unlicensed individuals or agencies.

These provisions to reform adoption procedures are contained in the compromise agreement.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I urge Members of the House to give their strong support to this measure to strengthen and continue the Federal effort to assist in the prevention and treatment of child abuse.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's explanation, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS)?

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to state that I have reviewed carefully the changes that were suggested, and I believe that they enhance the bill rather than doing anything otherwise. I would urge the support of the Members.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, again I do want to express particular appreciation to members of the subcommittee on both sides of the aisle and, in particular, the distinguished ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS), as well as the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI), the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MILLER), and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. KILDEE) for their contributions.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this bill will win the overwhelming support of the Members on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana that the Senate amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the first request of the gentleman from Indiana for the consideration of the Senate amendments in the House?

There was no objection.

TITLE II—ADOPTION OPPORTUNITIES

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF PURPOSE

SEC. 201. The Congress hereby finds that many thousands of children remain in institutions or foster homes solely because of legal and other barriers to their placement in permanent, adoptive homes; that the majority of such children are of school age, handicapped, or both; that adoption may be the best alternative for assuring the healthy development of such children; that there are qualified persons seeking to adopt such children who are unable to do so because of barriers to their placement; and that, in order both to enhance the stability and love of the child's home environment and to avoid wasteful expenditures of public funds, such children should not be maintained in foster care or institutions when adoption is appropriate and families for them can be found. It is, therefore, the purpose of this title to facilitate the elimination of barriers to adoption and to provide permanent and loving home environments for children who would benefit by adoption, particularly children with special needs by—

(1) promoting the establishment of model adoption legislation and procedures in the States and territories of the United States in order to eliminate jurisdictional and legal obstacles to adoption; and

(2) providing a mechanism for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to (A) promote quality standards for adoption services (including pre-placement, post-placement, and post-adoption counseling and standards to protect the rights if children in need of adoption), and (B) provide for a national adoption and foster care information data gathering and analysis system and a national adoption information exchange system to bring together children who would benefit by adoption and qualified prospective adoptive parents who are seeking such children.

MODEL ADOPTION LEGISLATION AND PROCEDURES

SEC. 202. (a) Not later than eighteen months after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") shall issue, based on the recommendations of the panel described in subsection (b) of this section, proposed model adoption legislation and procedures and publish such proposal in the Federal Register for comment. After soliciting and giving due consideration to the comments of interested individuals, groups, and organizations and consulting further with such panel, the Secretary shall issue and publish model adoption legislation and procedures which shall not conflict with the provisions of any interstate compact in operation pursuant to which States are making, supervising, or regulating placements of children.

(b)(1) Not later than ninety days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall appoint a panel (hereinafter referred to as the "panel") to be composed of not less than eleven nor more than seventeen members generally representative of public and voluntary organizations, agencies, and persons interested and with expertise and experience in facilitating the achievement of the purposes of this title (including, but not limited to, national, State and local child welfare organizations, including those representative of minorities, and adoptive parent organizations). The panel shall (A) review current conditions, practices, and laws relating to adoption, with special reference to their effect on facilitating or impeding the location of suitable adoptive homes for children who would benefit by adoption and the completion of suitable adoptions for such children and (B) not later than twelve months after the date on which the members of the panel have been appointed, propose to the Secretary model (including adoption assistance agreement) legislation and procedures relating to adoption designed to facilitate adoption by families of all economic levels.

(2) The panel shall be terminated thirty days after the Secretary publishes the final model legislation and procedures pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.

(3) Members of the panel, other than those regularly employed by the Federal Government, while serving on business of the panel shall be entitled to receive compensation at a rate not in excess of the daily equivalent of the rate payable to a GS-18 employee under section 5322 of title 5, United States Code, including traveltime; and, while so serving away from their homes or regular places of business, they may be allowed travel expenses (including per diem in lieu of subsistence) as authorized by section 5703 of such title for persons in the Government service employed intermittently.

(c) The Secretary shall take such steps as he or she deems necessary to encourage and facilitate the enactment in each State of comprehensive adoption assistance legislation and the establishment in each State of the model legislation and procedures published pursuant to subsection (a) of this section.

INFORMATION AND SERVICES

SEC. 203. (a) The Secretary shall establish in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare an appropriate administrative arrangement to provide a centralized focus for planning and coordinating of all departmental activities affecting adoption and foster care and for carrying out the provisions of this title. The Secretary shall make available such consultant services and personnel, together with appropriate administrative expenses, as are necessary for carrying out such purposes.

(b) In connection with carrying out the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, the Secretary shall—

(2) conduct (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies or organizations) an education and training program on adoption, and prepare, publish, and disseminate (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies and organizations) to all interested parties, public and private agencies and organizations (including, but not limited to, hospitals, health care and family planning clinics, and social services agencies), and governmental bodies, information and education and training materials regarding adoption and adoption assistance programs;

(3) notwithstanding any other provision of law, provide (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies or organizations) for (A) the operation of a national adoption information exchange system (including only such information as is necessary to facilitate the adoptive placement of children, utilizing computers and data processing methods to assist in the location of children who would benefit by adoption and in the placement in adoptive homes of children awaiting adoption); and (B) the coordination of such system with similar State and regional systems;

(4) provide (directly or by grant to or contract with public or private nonprofit agencies or organizations, including parent groups) for the provision of technical assistance in the planning, improving, developing, and carrying out of programs and activities relating to adoption; and

(5) consult with other appropriate Federal departments and agencies in order to promote maximum coordination of the services and benefits provided under programs carried out by such departments and agencies with those carried out by the Secretary, and provide for the coordination of such aspects of all programs within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to adoption.

STUDY OF UNLICENSED ADOPTION AGENCIES

SEC. 204. The Secretary shall provide for a study (the results of which shall be reported to the appropirate committees of the Congress not later than eighteen months after the date of enactment of this Act) designed to determine the nature, scope, and effects of the interstate (and, to the extent feasible, intrastate) placement of children in adoptive homes (not including the homes of stepparents or relatives of the child in question) by persons or agencies which are not licensed by or subject to regulation by any governmental entity.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 205. There are authorized to be appropriated $5,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, and such sums as may be necessary for the succeeding three fiscal years to carry out this title.

Amend the Senate amendment to the title of the bill so as to read: "An Act to promote the healthy development of children who would benefit from adoption by facilitating their placement in adoptive homes, to extend and improve the provisions of the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, and for other purposes.".

Mr. BRADEMAS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments to the Senate amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the compromise version which is before the House today. This version is somewhat changed from the one that we considered last September 26. At that time, I am sure my colleagues will recall that there was considerable discussion over an amendment which provided criminal sanctions for those who exploited and abused children through pornographic films. The controversy at that time was not over whether sexual exploitation should be prohibited, but whether the provision should be attached to this legislation or some other bill reported directly by the Judiciary Committee. The matter was resolved on February 6, 1978, when the President signed into law the Protection of Children Against Sexual Exploitation Act of 1977. This was the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee. As a result we did not have to deal with that provision in meetings with the Senate in attempting to resolve the bill.

What we did do was adopt a House initiative which would put more money into State efforts for actual "hands on" services for child abuse prevention and treatment. I think this is significant and it reflects our concern that more money go to specific and direct services for children and less for studies and meetings. Beginning in 1980, 30 percent of all money in this legislation will go to State efforts.

One of the provisions that I do want to comment on which I feel holds promise for eradicating a terrible problem is the one in the compromise agreement which provides money for programs and projects for no less than three centers for treatment of sexually abused children and those persons who commit those abuses. We authorized dollars which cover the support, treatment, training of personnel, and other related services which may be used to prevent, identify, and treat sexually abused children and their families. This provision comes as a result of hearings held by the subcommittee in which we heard very touching and very tragic stories. Congressman GEORGE MILLER and I developed this amendment after studying the matter and then hearing some of the most potent and dramatic testimony I have ever heard as a Member of Congress. Possibly the most dramatic came from a panel of workers, lawyers, policemen, a parent who had sexually abused his child, and a child who had been sexually abused. This group deals with parents and children who have been involved in incestuous relationships and works with both parties as well as the rest of the family. They claim that sexual abuse in families is far more extensive than the number of children who are used in pornographic materials. They claim that—

25 percent of the women in America have been sexually molested as children, and over one-half of them by family members or close family friends. Although the statistics are not complete, we have reason to believe that an equal number of men were also molested as children.

Tom Warren, who is the vice president of Parents United told the committee that he had an affair with his daughter 5 years ago. He said that because he and his wife worked different hours that they did not see much of each other and he had "the need to be wanted and loved." He said that he loved his daughter and "it just happened." He served 9 months in jail and then became involved with Parents United, where he explained in a very touching way that the center helped him understand himself and his family. He indicated that he never had any desire to seek a relationship with a prostitute or anyone other than his wife.

Debbie Rome was sexually abused by her stepfather between the ages of 9 and 15. She is 19 today and appeared to be thoroughly accepting of her experiences as well as the world around her. She now works with Daughters United, who help girls who have been in situations similar to hers. What was significant about Parents United was that of the 800 families who have been served by the program, not one of the females who had been sexually abused became a prostitute or became involved with drugs of any sort. Even more significant is that out of the 800 families served, only two were involved in any way with pornographic films. The Jeffords-Miller amendment will provide authority and hopefully dollars to establish at least five more centers throughout the country like this one. I think such centers are going a long way toward helping both parents and children to correct experiences that they would both prefer to forget.

The compromise before us today reflects the concern of the Congress that in the matter of child abuse, the Federal Government has begun an effort to help States and local jurisdictions to try to prevent child abuse and provide adequate treatment wherever it does exist. This legislation represents a true partnership between Federal, State, and local jurisdictions. It is my hope that as a result of it that abuse of children disappears forever.

I am also pleased with the amendments setting up mechanisms to bring uniformity in adoptions. Congressman MILLER deserves a great deal of credit for the extensive work he has done in this area.

I urge Members to support the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the legislation just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

VOTING RIGHTS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

(Mr. RYAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, 15 years ago, as chairman of an education subcommittee of the California State Assembly, I investigated a situation in Paradise, Calif., in which a great teacher was being harassed and threatened by a few self-appointed anti-Communists who accused her of teaching communism. They conveniently left out the preposition "about" in front of the word.

Today, of course, the climate of fear in the Nation has passed, but that great teacher still teaches. Last week she was in our Nation's Capitol with a group of bright and capable young people under the sponsorship of the fine Close-Up program, and I had a chance to renew our friendship of 15 years.

The students of her school, in San Rafael, Calif., in Representative JOHN BURTON'S district, have asked me to introduce a constitutional amendment which would allow all persons eligible to vote in the November election by reason of age, to be eligible to vote in the primary election for the same office. The idea is a good one, and should be swiftly enacted. I am proud to be the author of a bill whose concept originated with these students from San Rafael High School and their teacher, Dr. Virginia Franklin.

In 1944, in the Smith against Allwright case, the Supreme Court ruled that the primary was an integral part of the entire election process. All Federal officials should be elected similarly so that no one segment can be denied a crucial vote in the primary. Although the State controls its own primary, it is up to them to supply equal protection of the law, and for this reason Congress should set the example. Ten States including Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Ohio, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia already have corrected this shortcoming, thus magnifying the existing inequity.

The experience of voting is the ultimate field trip for students who have merely read about government, and this early involvement in the election process will more likely become a lifetime habit. With the passage of this bill, young people will be more involved in the political campaigns of the future and will increase their interest in government. And if we continue to discriminate against new voters, their initial contact with elections will be a negative one. Past experience has shown that many young people do not carry on and pick up their electoral duties after high school because they never had the actual opportunity while in school. This amendment will change that. Those who assisted in initiating what must become a nationwide movement among young people are as follows:

Proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right to vote in any election to nominate any candidate for any Federal office to citizens who will be eighteen years of age or older on the date of the election for such office.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to be valid only if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years of the date of final passage of this joint resolution:

ARTICLE —

Section 1. The right of citizens of the United States, who will be eighteen years of age or older on the date of any election for the office of President or Vice-President of the United States or for the office of Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, the Congress of the United States, to vote in any election to nominate any candidate for such office shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of age.

Section 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

INTRODUCTION OF CONSUMER QUALITY SAFE DRINKING WATER ACT

(Mrs. HECKLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, since the day the Environmental Protection Agency was created it has been diligently busy cleaning our air, lakes, rivers, and streams so that fish and other natural inhabitants of the water may live in clean water. I have supported these programs.

Throughout this period, however, the EPA has paid much less attention than we would like to the quality of the water that people drink. Funds and technical expertise have been abundant when it comes to cleaning rivers and streams. But they have been less abundant when it comes to providing clean and safe drinking water that is fit for human consumption.

The time is overdue for an emphasis on safe water to begin. Americans everywhere deserve to have confidence in the water they drink. They deserve to know that it is dependably clean and of high quality.

Mr. Speaker, as a Representative of a region of the country that is historic but also possesses aging public drinking water systems, I am introducing the Consumer Quality Safe Drinking Water Act.

This vitally needed legislation would provide $250 million during the next 3 fiscal years to improve the worst and most unreliable water treatment plants in our Nation.

I urge my colleagues to take notice of this new and needed direction and focus and support this critically needed legislation.

WASTEFUL NSF SPENDING

(Mr. ASHBROOK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, intellectual gobbledygook. Wasteful spending. Every year millions and millions of taxpayers' dollars go down the drain without serving any useful purpose.

One particular study which was funded by the National Science Foundation cost taxpayers nearly $1 million. A conclusion reached in that study was:

Complex systems possess the attributes of coupled non-linear feedback loops, in which dominance shifts from positive to negative loops.

Interesting? Maybe if you can understand this gibberish.

I question the application of the $918,000 which was granted to the NSF for this study. In plain English, the study concluded that individuals who go camping in Big Sky, Mont., dislike insects and mosquitoes. Brilliant.

CBS' "60 Minutes" recently did a segment exposing this outrageous study. The segment was appropriately entitled "Bugs Are a Negative Factor." One man on the show said:

I know a little bit about hunting and fishing and camping and stuff like that, and for $900 I could tell them the same thing they spent $900,000 to find out.

Unfortunately, as "60 Minutes" reporter Andrew A. Rooney stated:

The Government-sponsored study wasn't very special. Over the years it was nothing but one of thousands.

This study is all too typical of the Federal Government's abuse of our hard-earned dollars. Research grants given out by Federal agencies such as the National Science Foundation are an area of particular abuse.

As I have asked time and time again, why should the taxpayer have to pay the bill for these ridiculous projects? Why should our citizens have to finance NSF studies such as the social behaviour of prairie dogs or why people fall in love? By all means let's encourage and support good basic research. But let's also strike a blow for commonsense.

When the NSF authorization bill comes up on the House floor, I'll be offering an amendment to reduce some of this wasteful spending. It may be a drop in the Federal bucket, but every drop counts.

I urge my colleagues to support my amendment and reduce wasteful spending. Following is the complete text of "60 Minutes'" excellent story:

[From "60 Minutes"]

BUGS ARE A NEGATIVE FACTOR

MIKE WALLACE. "Bugs are a negative factor." What in the world does that mean? You'll find out shortly. It's part of a 60 Minutes investigation—not perhaps the kind of investigation you're used to here on 60 Minutes, but an investigation nonetheless, conducted by our friend Andrew Rooney, whom you see here from time to time. He begins with a man who not too long ago was one of the most familiar faces in millions of American households.

CHET HUNTLEY. Boy, is there a lot to do when you begin to plan for the handling of soil and the— the handling of water, and you just don't push—come in and push dirt around, as you might do—might have done 50 years ago. You have to be careful these days.

ANDREW ROONEY. This is Big Sky. I'm standing on the front lawn of the house built by the late Chet Huntley of NBC News. Big Sky is the controversial recreational development in the middle of one of our last great wilderness areas—the Gallatin Canyon in Montana. Seven years ago Montana State University applied for a grant from the National Science Foundation for a study of this area. Over a period of years, they were given a total of $918,000. We thought it might be interesting to some of you taxpayers to see what you got for your $918,000.

There were 32 separate studies done on the Gallatin Canyon. It seems unlikely they'll be making a movie of any of them: "Measurement and Meaning of Recreation Satisfaction: A Case Study in Camping"; "Use Satisfaction as a Function of Recreation Management"; and this one: "Attitudes and Behavior and Outdoor Recreation in the Wildernism Scale"; and this best-seller: "Critical Incident Methodology Applied to Camper Satisfaction". So that there wouldn't be any confusion about what these things meant, we talked to Dr. David Stuart, one of the principal investigators, and to Elizabeth Hurley, an assistant.

ELIZABETH HURLEY. The monographs are the more technical scientific reports—

ROONEY. Did you edit those?

HURLEY. —and—yes, I did. But they are also designed to be readable by the educated, interested layman. So that we sort of would use me as a measuring point, and if it was too complicated or too much jargon in a particular discipline so that I did not follow it, we would send it back to the author, and say, "Hey, let's rework this. We want this material to be easily understood."

ROONEY. Uh-hmm. What does this mean: "Complex systems possess the attributes of coupled non-linear feedback loops, in which dominance shifts from positive to negative loops"?

HURLEY. I grant you that one is one of the more technical ones, and that does not happen to be my field.

ROONEY. "A multi-dimensional concept of a wildernism-urbanism continuum replaced the comfort continuum concept in defining the functional relationships among the components of the model."

HURLEY. I—

ROONEY. Could you simplify that, Elizabeth?

HURLEY [laughing]. Now, here again you're dealing in a—a very complex area. You will be talking with Dr. Shontz, one of the—

ROONEY. But I understand the English language—

HURLEY. Yes.

ROONEY. —and I don't understand that at all. What's the word "wildernism"?

HURLEY. That is a word that has been coined, and you will be talking with Dr. Shontz, one of the lead scientists on that particular aspect of this project.

ROONEY. But isn't this part of the gobbledygook that—that justifies people asking for more money from Washington, making it sound as though it's something it isn't?

Dr. Stuart, what do you think that means? Or you—that's not your department?

Dr. DAVID STUART. I'm a microbiologist by training, yes. That's systems language. That's pure and simple systems language.

ROONEY. That's different from English?

Dr. STUART. That's right.

HURLEY. Oh, yes—

Dr. STUART. It's—

HURLEY. —absolutely—

ROONEY. But you were supposed to simplify it.

HURLEY. —as opposed to—

ROONEY. Couldn't you say, "Come off it, we're writing this for people to read!"?

Dr. STUART. These technical reports are written basically for other people in the field—

ROONEY. But if you wrote this——

Dr. STUART. —so we have written different ones——

ROONEY. —in common English, a scientist wouldn't understand it?

HURLEY. Perhaps something would be lost. It's simply——

ROONEY. Probably the—probably the government grant.

Dr. STUART. And—and in truth, the—there is some jargon in here. You know, there's a lot of jargon in there. But we tried to weed it out.

ROONEY. I did talk to two of the professors who actually wrote several of the studies, Dr. Anne Williams and Dr. William Shontz.

Dr. ANNE WILLIAMS. We use terms in a very precise manner in order to communicate unambiguously with one another. And so sometimes we use words that don't mean sense to the public, but we do that deliberately in order to make sense with one another and to be able to communicate clearly.

ROONEY. You use the word "wildernism."

Dr. WILLIAM SHONTZ. I believe it's a—a shortening of——

ROONEY. Lengthening, isn't it?

Dr. SHONTZ. No, it's a shortening of "wilderness purism," or something like that. What—what they're talking about is——

ROONEY. It's better than just "wilderness"?

Dr. WILLIAMS. "Wilderness" has a different meaning——

Dr. SHONTZ. Yeah.

Dr. WILLIAMS. —than the word "wildernism."

ROONEY. What—what is the difference?

Dr. WILLIAMS. "Wildernism" refers to a subjective state that people experience when they are in the wilderness.

ROONEY. "A multi-dimensional concept of a wildernism-urbanism continuum replaced the comfort continuum concept in defining the functional relationships among the components of the model." Now that has clear meaning to both of you?

Dr. SHONTZ. It does to me, since I was the primary author on the—the article. What I was trying to express there is a—is a very complex concept that they still haven't completely worked out. It's not ready, you know, for publication in The Reader's Digest.

ROONEY. Here's something called "The Equation for Computing the Scenic Beauty Index."

Dr. SHONTZ. Uh-huh.

ROONEY. You familiar with that?

Dr. SHONTZ. Yes.

ROONEY. You put in a tree in the computer, and its prettier? Or—I mean that's——

Dr. SHONTZ. No. You put in things—in that particular index—for example, previous research has shown pretty conclusively that people like variety in their—in their scenic settings, that they like water included, that they don't like haze. They like sweeping vistas.

ROONEY. They don't like bugs, I notice in here. They—they have a—a better "recreational satisfaction quotient" if there aren't flies biting—

Dr. SHONTZ. Bugs are a negative factor. [Laughter]

ROONEY. But it's really necessary to say it that way, you think?

Dr. SHONTZ. Well—to be that detailed? Or to—

ROONEY. No, to be this obscure, so that the rest of us can't know what you're talking about.

Dr. WILLIAMS. Our job is to systematically observe and record what's happening—

ROONEY. Now—

Dr. WILLIAMS.—and in the process of doing that to point out where those of us who take a quick glance, such as, perhaps, a person such as yourself, are often incorrect in their assessment.

ROONEY. Well now, I took a quick glance at this chart on page 40, Appendix A, and I—I suspect my assessment of it is probably wrong. But if you showed that—I'm going to do this to some people out around—what do you think their impression of that would be?

Dr. WILLIAMS. It was—it was not designed to communicate with the general public.

[Shows the chart to three citizens of the area . . . laughter]

ROONEY. The average sociologist would understand that perfectly well?

Dr. WILLIAMS. No, the average sociologist would not understand that.

ROONEY. Who would understand it?

Dr. WILLIAMS. This is a systems dynamics model.

ROONEY. Who would understand it?

Dr. WILLIAMS. Industrial engineers would understand it. Many soc—

ROONEY. You mean, if I took that to an industrial engineer, he would say, "Aha, so that's what's happening at Big Sky."

Dr. WILLIAMS. He would—well, of course, you can't read this because it—it's been reproduced in such poor fashion.

ROONEY. Dr. Roy Huffman is vice president of research at Montana State University.

Aren't all of these projects a form of intellectual welfare?

Dr. ROY HUFFMAN. I don't think that's a fair way to describe it, because research is an impo—important part of a university's function.

ROONEY. It seems to me that if most Americans knew that universities were getting this much government money, they would strenuously object to it. And yet, obviously in many cases it's a good thing.

Dr. HUFFMAN. Well, I'm sure that's true. Of course, we can say that, I suppose, about a lot of other areas of government activity.

ROONEY. But I think there's a great feeling in this country that we are a nation that has become so educated that we aren't doing anything more. We're learning more about things than we have time to do anything about.

Dr. HUFFMAN. I think there may be some truth to that.

ROONEY. The Big Sky recreation development area is about 45 miles from Bozeman in the southern part of Montana. Actually, it's just above Yellowstone Park. We drove out there one day and talked to three men who make a living in the area.

MAN ONE. It seems like they do a lot of studies like that, but the only people that find out about them are the ones that are doing them.

MAN TWO. The study possibly did show some things that in the future will be valuable if another resort is ever started, which I question it will be.

ROONEY. They have the feeling that they were able to get into this area before it had been touched, and that they can now, in the future, see what effect this development will have on the area.

MAN TWO. I would think you could go to any ski area that's already in existence and determine the impact pretty fast.

MAN ONE. I know a little bit about hunting and fishing and camping and stuff like that, and for $900 I could tell them the same thing they spent $900,000 to find out.

ROONEY. The government-sponsored study here wasn't very special. Over the years it was nothing but one of thousands. When it comes to the federal government, there are two things that all Americans are agreed on. One, it's spending too much money; and two, it's not spending too much on me. Naturally, the people who made this study don't think the federal government spent too much on it. Was the $900,000 spent here on Big Sky in the Gallatin Canyon wasted? Has this area been torn up and ruined with no regard for the study? Or did the study actually help preserve what was here? And if the study had no effect at all, here or anywhere else, was it still worth it as a training exercise for students? This is where the hard decisions have to be made when people talk about too much government spending.

Well, that's about it for the Big Sky report. It's getting so if you walk up to someone and say you're from 60 Minutes and would like to interview them, they begin to worry a lot. We shot 6,000 feet of film for this report; you just saw about 400 feet of it. It's probably some kind of a television first. The first soft-hitting investigative report ever to appear on 60 Minutes. We didn't uncover a real estate swindle. We didn't find fraud in government. None of the people we met were congenitally defective. What we did see was a little of how $900,000 of our tax money was spent. I hate to think of my tax contribution going into it, but the people who did the Gallatin Canyon study were honest and hard-working. There's a lot of good stuff in here.

Some of our questions were probably unfair, although there was obviously some nonsense in these reports too. A lot of times they camouflaged simple truths with wordy baloney just to make them sound more important than they are.

In Washington we talked to Dr. Larry Tombaugh, who directed the study for the National Science Foundation. He was worried and a little angry about what he thought we were going to do. "After all," he said, "nine hundred thousand dollars would only buy about thirteen minutes of commercial time on 60 Minutes." Well, they don't let us handle the money, Dr. Tombaugh, so I don't know whether that's true or not. And if it is true, I would not pretend to suggest which was the better buy.

ALTERNATIVES TO ABORTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. CORNELL) is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. CORNELL. Mr. Speaker, this House recently concluded lengthy debate on an issue which has been categorized as the most agonizing one facing Congress—Federal funding of abortions for indigent women. We spent over 5 months in conference and on the floor trying to determine under what conditions, if any, Federal dollars should be used to pay for abortions. The House considered 10 different versions of the so-called Hyde amendment before agreeing on final language. The Senate voted 18 times on this matter. In fact, this legislation consumed more time than any other bill debated during our first session.

We can probably expect to consider the issue again this year when the fiscal year 1979 appropriations bill for the Departments of Labor and Health, Education, and Welfare is debated. While I shall continue to support strongly an end to the use of Federal funds for abortions, before we become embroiled again in this heated debate, it is appropriate to examine the proper role of Government in this issue. If our goal is to reduce the incidence of abortion, and I believe that this should be our objective, then we should devote as much time and energy to finding alternatives to abortion as we have to debating the circumstances under which we will permit Federal dollars to be used for abortions.

During fiscal year 1975, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare spent approximately $100 million on family planning services authorized by title X of the Public Health Service. Title X, as my colleagues know, authorizes project grants and contracts for family planning service providers, for training family planning services personnel, for services delivery improvement research, for biomedical and behavioral sciences research related to population, and for the development and distribution of family planning information. The programs authorized under this title represent the major source of Federal funding for family planning services, although the Social Security Act does provide that AFDC recipients be counseled as to the availability of family planning services. In addition, the Government provides 90 percent matching for State funds used to provide family planning services to those who desire them.

During fiscal year 1975, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare also spent approximately $50 million or half as much as the amount allocated for family planning, to provide payments for medicaid abortions.

Based on these figures, I can only conclude that our family planning efforts have been insufficient to meet our needs. There must be something wrong in our thrust if half as much as the amount spent for family planning has been spent for abortions.

I believe our goal should be to reduce to zero the amount of Federal funds used for abortions and to use that money to fund a variety of alternatives that will make abortion less attractive as an option. There are several measures now pending before Congress which would help accomplish this objective. None of them has yet received final consideration by both Houses, a situation which certainly does not reflect well on our commitment to finding alternatives to abortion. If we are truly committed to reducing the number of abortions performed in the United States, it is imperative that we enact such legislation.

PREGNANCY DISABILITY

On December 7, 1976, the Supreme Court announced in General Electric Co. against Gilbert that General Electric's exclusion of pregnancy and pregnancy-related disabilities from its disability insurance program did not constitute discrimination based on sex as defined by title VII of the Civil Rights Act. In reaching this holding, the Court not only overturned the unanimous rulings on this issue of six Federal circuit courts, but placed in jeopardy the economic security of workingwomen.

Women compose 47 percent of the current labor force in the United States. Of this number, approximately 70 percent contribute a major share to the support of their families, either because they are the sole wage earner, are single, divorced or widowed, or because their husbands earn less than $7,000 a year. Approximately 85 percent of workingwomen become pregnant at some point during their working lives. In light of the number who must work for economic survival, it is easy to see that the Gilbert decision will have a dramatic effect on a woman's decision to elect an abortion.

When a woman is faced with losing her income for several weeks or months and perhaps with losing her job because of pregnancy, abortion can, unfortunately, become an economic factor. In fact, according to a report prepared by the HEW Task Force Group on Alternatives to Abortion, economic need is one of the major factors involved in the decision to seek an abortion among women 20 to 45 years old. This should not be the case.

One bill, S. 995, has already cleared the Senate and a similar version, H.R. 6075, is now pending before the House which would overturn the Gilbert decision. The legislation deserves the support of every Member of Congress who is concerned not only about preventing discrimination based on sex but also about preventing abortions. Employers who establish disability plans should not be permitted to exclude pregnancy from coverage under their plan. Such an exclusion surely violates the spirit as well as the letter of the law and will force working women to choose between their livelihood and their families.

As was apparent from the debate on the Hyde amendment, many House Members oppose Federal efforts to encourage abortions. This bill will help counter the pressure to terminate a pregnancy and should, therefore, be enacted into law this session.

TEENAGE PREGNANCY

It is a well-established fact that pregnancy among teenagers has reached epidemic proportions. There are approximately 21 million young people between the ages of 15 and 19 in the United States. Each year, more than 1 million of those in this age group, or one-tenth of all women, become pregnant. Pregnancy is not confined only to older adolescents, however; some 30,000 girls under age 15 get pregnant annually.

In 1974, of the pregnancies occurring among the 15- to 19-year-olds, 27 percent were terminated by abortion. Of the pregnancies among the under-15 group, 45 percent were terminated by abortion. In fact, teenage abortions account for one third of all abortions performed in the United States. The figures are staggering.

Teenage pregnancy represents a health problem, an education problem, and an economic problem. Children of young mothers face increased health risks. These babies are more likely to die in their first year; they are more likely to be premature and to have low birth weights. Low birth weight not only causes infant mortality, but can be a contributory cause of other childhood illnesses and birth injuries.

Young mothers also increase their own mortality rate through pregnancy. The death rate from complications of pregancy, birth, and delivery is 60 percent higher for women who become pregnant before they are 15. The rate for 15- to 19-year-olds is 13 percent higher than for mothers in their early 20's.

Pregnancy is a leading factor contributing to the dropout rate for females, and according to various studies, the younger the teenager, the higher the dropout rate because of pregnancy. Lacking basic educational skills, these young mothers must often resort to welfare and unemployment because they are unable to find jobs. Their status as mothers often prevents these young women from seeking full-time employment and their lack of education often prevents those who do work from obtaining meaningful positions.

It is obvious that past Federal efforts have failed to deal adequately with this critical problem. I am heartened, however, that several of my colleagues have recognized the urgency of this issue and have introduced legislation to provide assistance to teenagers faced with the dilemma of pregnancy. For example, Representative NOLAN has a proposal pending in the Subcommittee on Health to provide a coordinated array of medical, social, and counseling services to pregnant teenagers. This bill would authorize funds to assist State agencies in providing such services as health care for the mother, health care for the infants during preschool years, referral services to other agencies if appropriate, coordinated social services, including educational, vocational, legal, and social counseling, and funds to provide adoption services.

Representatives COHEN, MAZZOLI, and PREYER have sponsored a similar bill, the National School-Age Mother and Child Health Act. This bill would also provide for a wide range of services for the young mother and her child.

It is gratifying to note that the administration has recognized the problem of teenage pregnancy and is apparently developing a program to be submitted to Congress in the near future. According to a summary contained in the HEW budget request, the agency will propose a project grant program to help States and communities integrate existing pregnancy prevention and pregnancy-related programs. Services provided under the program would focus on the prevention of unwanted, initial and repeat pregnancies among adolescents and on assistance to pregnant adolescents as well as to adolescent parents to help prevent welfare dependency. Community programs would apparently include services similar to those proposed in the pending legislation mentioned above: Family planning, education concerning sexuality and the responsibility of parenthood, primary health care, pre- and post-natal health care, vocational and employment counseling, and educational services to help pregnant teenagers remain in school.

The problem of teenage pregnancy must be grappled with at all levels of government—local, State, and Federal. There are certain solutions which only local governments can propose, such as making available improved comprehensive health education. There is, however, a great deal that the Federal Government can do to help reduce the number of teenage pregnancies. The legislation now pending represents a starting point for finding solutions to this serious crisis. I hope the appropriate committees will schedule hearings in the near future.

ADOPTION

One of the problems a pregnant woman faces in determining what will happen to her child is the uncertain future the child faces if the mother elects to give it up for adoption. The situation is particularly acute for black children, those with biracial parents, or those who are handicapped. Not knowing the fate of her child could, of course, contribute to a woman's decision to terminate her pregnancy. To the extent that our adoption laws encourage an uncertain future, they should be changed.

It is, therefore, particularly gratifying that both Houses are close to enacting legislation that will remove the barriers to adoption. H.R. 6693, the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act, contains, in the Senate version, provisions of S. 961, the Opportunities for Adoption Act, sponsored by Senator CRANSTON. This bill will not only facilitate the adoption of children, but it also contains incentives to provide financial aid to a woman who is considering adoption. The bill has many important features. It creates a Committee on Uniform Adoption Regulations in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to facilitate interstate placement of children. It provides for grants for adoption assistance and services to States for allocation to approved adoption agencies. The funds can be used for any of the following purposes: First, to assist agencies in finding adoptive homes for special needs children; second, to assist in paying for prenatal, natal, and postpartum services for indigent expectant mothers who plan to place their children for adoption; and third, to assist in the provision of adoption subsidy agreements so that adoptive parents of children with special needs will have the money to care for the child.

The legislation also establishes a National Office of Adoption Information and Services to provide for an adoption information exchange service. Such a service will bring together children who would benefit by adoption and qualified prospective parents.

As a corollary to this proposal, there are several bills pending in the Ways and Means Committee which would help encourage adoption. These proposals offer a tax deduction for expenses incurred by parents who adopt a child. Enactment of this kind of proposal would reduce financial barriers which currently work to prevent adoptions.

It is important that Federal policy be geared to providing assistance to our Nation's most precious resource, our children. By enacting legislation to aid in the process of adoption, we will further sound national policy and provide pregnant women who do not wish to keep their children an alternative to abortion that is certainly more humane and in the best interest of both mother and child.

FAMILY PLANNING

In 1970, apparently recognizing the need for such services, Congress enacted the Family Planning Services and Population Act of 1970, adding a new title X to the Public Health Service Act. The law has been amended and extended several times since then. In addition to providing funds to make comprehensive family planning services available, as described earlier in my remarks, the law also calls for funding for research into all aspects of family planning.

There is no doubt that we need to spend additional dollars on the very important programs authorized under title X. We need to implement family planning programs all across the United States, with particular emphasis on low-income women who want such services but cannot afford them. Important strides toward this goal have been made, but given the number of unwanted pregnancies every year, it is obvious that further Federal efforts are needed.

Moreover, we need additional research on improved methods of birth control which will not be morally offensive to large segments of the population. The most effective contraceptive device, the pill, is also the one about which we know least in terms of its long-range effects and the one that poses the most serious health problems. Surely we have the capability of developing alternatives that are safe, effective and acceptable to a majority of the population.

I am pleased that legislation will apparently be considered in the Health Subcommittees of both Houses to extend family planning programs. I urge Members to give careful consideration to the unmet needs for services and for research when they determine appropriate funding levels for the programs authorized under title X.

Mr. Speaker, it is time for this House to take constructive action to reduce the incidence of abortion in the United States. We should provide a wide range of services to help people realize that there are alternatives to abortion. Although the list of measures I have outlined is by no means complete, it is indicative that we have the appropriate legislative vehicles pending to effect a humane national policy that will promote life. Given the strong feelings in both Houses on this issue, I believe it is time for us to work together to enact legislation to make abortion less attractive as an option for pregnant women. I hope my colleagues will join me in this effort.●

DIVESTITURE OF THE OIL COMPANIES: JUST THE FACTS PLEASE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, for more than a year now there have been various bills floating around the Congress which would seek to bar the major oil companies from involvement in coal and uranium production. The methods by which this goal would be accomplished vary but all are premised on the theory that bigness per se in the field of energy production is bad and should be prohibited. While I personally feel that the current Federal antitrust statutes, along with vigilance on the part of the Department of Justice, should provide the public with protection against undue concentration of economic power in the energy industry, I, as most Members, have been willing to listen to the divestiture proponents' arguments and examine the facts they have put forth. I must say, however, Mr. Speaker, that what the facts are is now increasingly open to question.

Throughout this discussion regarding divestiture of the oil companies, proponents have contended that those companies, particularly the "majors," have stifled competition and research for competing types of fuel, favoring instead oil and natural gas.

In an effort to discover if these charges were in fact true, members of the other body last year requested the General Accounting Office to report on the subject which GAO did on December 30, 1977. The GAO conclusion was that there is no undue concentration of power in the energy industry as it pertains to oil companies and their coal and uranium holdings.

At the same time the staff of the Federal Trade Commission was also conducting an extensive survey on the same issue. Since the House Committee on the Interior, on which I serve, will shortly be facing a markup session on legislation calling for divestiture. I and other committee members requested that the FTC forward copies of the draft reports for our use and consideration. These reports were requested on January 30, 1978 by Chairman UDALL and provided by the FTC to us on a confidential basis. Frankly, as the ranking minority member on the Energy and Environment Subcommittee, I was pleased to see the bottom line conclusions of the FTC staff in both areas surveyed, coal and uranium. In both cases the reports also supported the view that there is not now any undue concentration of economic power in the hands of the major oil companies so far as their ownership of coal and uranium reserves.

Mr. Speaker, these reports are hardly suspect since they were prepared by the staff of the FTC's Bureau of Competition and Bureau of Economics. While their conclusions have indeed not been adopted by the FTC as its official view on the issue, they were researched and written by staff members fully aware of the internal state of the energy industry and without bias or partiality.

Imagine my surprise in reading the Washington Star, the Wall Street Journal, the Washington Post, the New York Times, and other leading newspapers to find that these FTC reports in fact did not oppose divestiture, but in fact, favored stripping away from the oil companies their holdings of coal and uranium, amounting to billions of dollars of investment. These stories were also carried by wire services including United Press International.

The theme in each of the news reports was that the FTC favored placing limitations on the coal and uranium holdings of the oil industry and would so testify later this month before a committee of the other body. The source of this statement turned out to be Alfred Dougherty, Jr., Director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition, who obviously had not read the FTC staff reports which had been transmitted to the Interior Committee of the House. If he had, he decided to disregard their conclusions entirely, a classic case of the old adage: "Don't confuse me with the facts, my mind is made up."

A Washington Star article on April 5 contained a typical statement after the Dougherty interviews, which apparently he sought out himself:

> A Federal Trade Commission Staff study concludes that Congress should consider forcing some of the Nation's biggest oil companies to dispose of coal and uranium reserves worth millions of dollars.

Both the views attributed to Mr. Dougherty and the press accounts of these studies are totally at variance with the studies themselves. It would appear that this is a deliberate attempt by those in the FTC who favor divestiture to mislead the public and gratuitously support their own cause.

Mr. Speaker, this Nation continues in the throes of an energy crisis which has placed the reliance of the United States and its people on foreign oil exporting nations who have little regard for our welfare. If we are ever to achieve energy independence, or even approach that goal, it must be through the private economic sector and full and free competition in the energy industry. It will also require the investment of billions of dollars by American energy companies willing to take the risks attendant upon such an undertaking. Divestiture could seriously hamper such energy development and deprive the American people of needed energy resources at a crucial point in our history.

Mr. Speaker, the seriousness of this issue makes it imperative that advocates on both sides of the energy divestiture debate tell the whole truth and avoid the use of false propaganda and self-serving publicity. In an effort to lay the full FTC reports before the Congress and the public I am including at the close of my remarks copies of the full summaries of the reports on both coal and uranium holdings of the oil industry and I will also make public the contents of these reports. I am compelled to do so by the actions of the officials of the FTC who have deliberately attempted to conceal the evidence and distort the truth. This is hardly what should be expected from officials of an independent regulatory agency charged by law with protecting the public interest.

Mr. Speaker, for the sake of contrast, I also include the UPI news story which appeared in the Washington Star on April 5, 1978, which purports to reveal the contents of the two FTC studies:

The summaries and news article follow:

(Summary of findings from draft study by FTC staff entitled "The Structure of the Nation's Coal Industry, 1964–1974.)

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

This study of the structure of the United States coal industry involves both conceptual and data problems. The conceptual difficulties (including the impossibility of stating universally applicable market definitions as well as problems relating to the selection of particular markets and universes) may be significant. As a result of these difficulties, some of the concentration ratios presented in this report may over- or understate actual concentration in the coal industry. The data problems (including the impossibility of securing comparable coal reserve data from all surveyed companies) are judged to be relatively minor, and the overall data upon which the various concentration ratios are based are deemed the best available. The report's general findings may be summarized as follows.

In general, the structure of the United States coal industry during the survey period was conducive to competition. Coal production concentration was low to moderate throughout the 1964–1974 period, both nationally and in all regions except the Midwestern Region. On the national level and in the Appalachian and Western Regions, however, production concentration was somewhat greater in 1974 than in 1964. National production concentration rose from 1964 through 1969 (extending a trend that had apparently begun at least as early as 1955). National concentration decreased in 1970 and 1971, increased in 1972, and again decreased in 1973 and 1974. Concentration trends within the various regional markets generally followed the national pattern.

A primary cause of the general decreases in concentration during the 1970–1974 period was the shift from underground to surface mining that resulted in large part from the impacts of the Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969 and the Clean Air Amendments of 1970. The major coal strikes of 1971 and 1974 also contributed to the fall in concentration, as did the rise in oil and natural gas prices that occurred in 1973 and 1974. These higher price levels, in conjunction with transportation innovations and sulfur emission regulations, have resulted in increased shipments of Western coal into the Midwestern Region and may further broaden geographic markets for coal in the future. Such higher prices may also encourage the entry of new firms, although the lead time necessary to bring any significant new coal mine onstream will cause a lag between the time of the decision to enter and actual production.

It is, of course, possible that the production deconcentration that occurred in 1973 and 1974 will be reversed or that federal policy changes or technological developments will result in a resumption of the long-term upward trend in concentration on a national basis and/or in various regional markets. For example, a relaxation of sulfur emission standards or the development of economic stack gas scrubbers could reduce the expansion of markets that has occurred in response to the need for low-sulfur coal.

For the nation as a whole, concentration of coal shipments to electric utilities (the largest coal market) was higher than production concentration throughout the 1964–1974 period, but it still was rather low. Unlike national production concentration, in 1974 both 4- and 8-firm concentration of coal shipments to electric utilities was lower than in 1964. Concentration in the national utilities market followed the same general trend as national production concentration, increasing from 1964 through 1970, decreasing in 1971, increasing in 1972, and again decreasing in 1973 and 1974. The decrease that occurred in these latter two years may have resulted in part from the increasing share of shipments to electric utilities accounted for by smaller (nonsurveyed) coal producers and in part from the significant coal work stoppage which occurred in 1974.

Although 4- and 8-firm concentration of coal shipments to electric utilities was rather low on a national basis during 1964–1974, regional concentration levels and trends varied considerably. For example, between 1964 and 1974 there were increases in concentration in the Middle Atlantic, South Atlantic, East South Central and Mountain Regions, and there were decreases in the West North Central and East North Central Regions.

Concentration of metallurgical coal sales on a national basis (which, as discussed in Chapter 3, appears to be the appropriate geographic market) was moderate throughout the 1964–1974 period. In 1974, the top four sellers of metallurgical coal accounted for 41 percent of total domestic metallurgical coal sales, while the top eight sellers accounted for 54 percent of this market. Metallurgical coal does not face significant competition from alternative fuels, but it is increasingly facing competition from blends of other grades of coal.

Information obtained from the surveyed companies regarding the surveyed companies' ownership of coal "resources" (a broad and somewhat speculative measure of coal deposits) indicated that the nation's coal resources were not concentrated in the hands of the surveyed companies, which held 10.2 percent of the nation's coal resources in 1967 and 13.3 percent in 1974. (The largest percentage of coal resources held by the surveyed firms occurred in the Appalachian Region, where they accounted for 13.4 percent of total coal resources in 1967 and 14.6 percent in 1974.) The percentage of total national coal resources controlled by the eight largest surveyed resource holders increased from 7.7 percent in 1967 to 8.5 percent in 1974, an increase of approximately 10 percent.

Concentration of coal reserves (a less inclusive but more reliable and economically meaningful measure than coal "resources") was low in all regions for total coal and for bituminous, subbituminous, low-sulfur and surface mineable coal.[1] In general the most desirable reserves are the most concentrated, but lignite (low B.t.u.) reserves were moderately concentrated. For each coal type, estimated ranges for the concentration of uncommitted coal reserves indicated that it generally did not differ substantially from the concentration of total (committed and uncommitted) reserves.

Primarily because of the acquisition of several large independent coal companies by petroleum companies and metal mining companies, the percentages of coal production, shipments to electric untilities, and coal resources accounted for by the surveyed independent coal companies decreased dramatically over the 1967–1974 period. In 1967 the surveyed independent coal companies held 32 percent of coal production, 38.8 percent of coal shipments to electric utilities, and 2.3 percent of total coal resources. By 1974 the shares held by this group had fallen to 11.5 percent, 12.5 percent, and 0.9 percent in these respective fields. Of the surveyed companies, conglomerate (primarily metal mining) companies in 1974 constituted the largest group of coal producers, and oil/gas companies held the largest share of the nation's coal reserves.

In 1974, the 32 surveyed oil/gas companies (including the leading 20 domestic oil and gas producers) accounted for 16.2 percent of total United States coal production, 18.6 percent of the coal shipments to electric utilities, and 12.8 percent of total coal reserves. (See Appendix 4–B for the oil/gas company group's share of selected reserve universes excluding unleased federal reserves.) In the various regional coal markets, the surveyed oil/gas companies held varying shares, including 19.3 percent of total coal production in the Midwest and West Region; 22.5 percent of the coal shipments to electric utilities in the West North Central area; and 28, 19.7, and 16.8 percent of, respectively, the lignite, surface mineable, and low-sulfur coal reserves in the Western Region in 1974. The oil/gas company group ranked above all of the other surveyed groups in overall reserve ownership and in most subcategories thereof. To the extent that concentration ratios are a reliable indicator of the competitiveness of the coal market—a question that the staff is presently pursuing—the various market percentages held by the oil/gas company group indicate a low probability that oil and gas companies possessed enough power to control coal markets.

As discussed in Chapter 5, small companies may be deterred from entry into that segment of the coal industry requiring the extremely large initial capital investment needed to develop a mine large enough to meet the requirements of huge electric utility and coal liquefaction and gasification plants.[2] Average mine size is increasing, but coal markets appear large enough to absorb numerous large producers, so scale economies per se do not seem to pose a significant competitive problem. Nevertheless, a competitive problem does arise if an insufficient number of companies can muster the funds necessary to enter this capital-intensive market.

[1] "Concentration" here refers to the percentage of reserves controlled by the largest reserve holders among the surveyed companies. It is possible that some of the largest reserve holders were not surveyed, so that the report's concentration ratios may understate true concentration levels. Both the coal resource and coal reserve universes include the substantial coal deposits held by such non-producers as Federal and state governments and Indian tribes. See Chapter 1 for a discussion of the understatement of coal resource and reserve concentration ratios that might result from the inclusion of such coal deposits in the various universes. See also Appendixes 3–C and 4–B for selected concentration ratios calculated using universes that exclude estimated unleased federal reserves.

[2] In addition, equipment shortages, transportation limitations and many environmental and legal uncertainties may continue to impede the growth of, and new entry into, the nation's coal industry.

The petroleum companies possess the capital necessary to effectively compete in that portion of the coal market which has relatively high entry barriers. It does not appear that the case has been made for the exclusion of oil companies from the coal market on the basis of the industry structure data developed and analyzed in this report. The staff's future report on the conduct and performance of the coal industry may provide further insights into the competitive impact of oil company presence in the coal industry.

SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL CONCLUSIONS

1. Engineering cost estimates developed by ERDA indicate significant scale economies in uranium milling. However, ERDA cost estimates are somewhat misleading in that there are many circumstances under which a larger mill will not yield lower costs or even be practicable. With given demand conditions, mill size is principally determined by the characteristics of discovered deposits. The discovery of large, geographically concentrated deposits might warrant the construction of a large mill and thereby enable the raw ore to be processed at lower costs. Smaller, more geographically dispersed deposits would warrant smaller mills and entail higher processing costs. The average size of existing mills is less than 2,000 tons per day. This is substantially smaller than what ERDA's estimates suggest is least cost size. Since final product transportation costs are low and plant sites are determined by the location of exploitable ore bodies, multiplant scale economies do not appear to be of great importance.

2. If recent demand projections are reasonably accurate, the long run potential for a workably competitive uranium industry appears to be good. If future exploration results in the discovery of deposits warranting the construction of average size plants (2,000 tons per day), somewhere between 39 and 47 individual plants would be required to meet the projected 1990 demand. If future exploration results in the discovery of deposits warranting the construction of plants that are twice as large as the historical average, somewhere between 19 and 24 individual plants would be required to meet the projected 1990 demand. In either case, this should be enough to guarantee reasonably competitive prices as long as diverse ownership patterns continue to prevail.

3. Uranium reserve concentration levels are moderately high, but below concentration levels in production. They also show a decline with increases in cutoff cost. In the long run, the supply of reserves can be expanded through exploration and development of new deposits. Measures of concentration based on land holdings and drilling footage are substantially lower than reserve concentration, and exhibit a decline after 1973. This would suggest a decline in reserve concentration as the market for uranium grows.

4. There do not appear to be any compelling barriers to entry into the uranium mining and milling industry. Any attempts to maintain prices above long run marginal costs of production would attract new entrants. Recent entry into the industry has been significant, with 21 companies entering or announcing entry into uranium production since 1974, and at least 96 companies currently exploring for uranium ore. Such new entry suggests that concentration in uranium production should decline in the future. In the absence of compelling entry barriers and significant multi-plant economies of scale, prospects for diverse ownership and continued deconcentration in the uranium industry appear to be good.

5. The price of uranium has risen substantially over the last three years. This trend reflects a number of different factors including the emergence of OPEC, the Westinghouse fuel contract abrogations, and changes in Government fuel enrichment policies. At the same time, knowledge regarding the shape of the long run uranium supply schedule is limited. The lack of knowledge has been the source of debate with respect to the proper Government role in the development of breeder reactors and plutonium fuel. Our analysis suggests that ERDA's uranium resource estimates may substantially understate actual resource availability. We therefore believe that, from the standpoint of uranium supply, there is no need for an early decision to undertake recycling or reprocessing o rto proceed more rapidly with breeder development. We would recommend that decisions regarding these technologies be deferred until the results of the National Uranium Resource Evaluation are evaluated.

6. The recent upward trend in prices has resulted in much new entry into the uranium business and a significant expansion in drilling efforts. Nevertheless, there is considerable concern over long-term resource availability. The Nuclear Fuel Cycle Task Force has recommended that the Government investigate the possibility of price guarantees to assure future production. It is our view that futures contracts can provide a viable means of overcoming future demand uncertainty, and that market price signals can be relied upon to supply incentives to call forth adequate future production. We therefore do not believe that price guarantees are warranted at this time.

7. The lifting of the U.S. embargo on uranium imports should increase competition from foreign sources of supply. While the international uranium industry may be susceptible to cartelization, the ability of the cartel to exercise market power is difficult to assess given the present uncertainty of foreign uranium resource estimates. The ability of a uranium cartel to exercise the degree of market power currently enjoyed by OPEC would be restricted by competition from U.S. producers and the existence of a U.S. Government uranium stockpile.

8. Our analysis suggests that the domestic uranium industry is workably competitive. Since there do not appear to be any compelling barriers to entry, we do not believe that a small group of uranium producers could persistently maintain price above cost. Such an attempt would presumably prompt new entry. Public policy concern over competition in the uranium industry and in other energy industries has focused principally on oil and gas company involvement. Oil and gas companies control about 52 percent of uranium reserves. However, this accounts for only 2.1 percent of total proven BTUs available for generation of electricity, raising oil and gas company control of such BTUs from 20.7 to 22.8 percent. Our analysis suggests that oil and gas company involvement in the uranium industry has probably been procompetitive. Oil and gas company energy into uranium has been almost entirely through internal expansion. The data indicate that the oil and gas companies have been proceeding with resource development and exploitation at rates comparable to the rest of the industry participants. We therefore do not believe that a ban on oil and gas company involvement in the uranium industry would represent sound public policy. We believe that a better approach would be a rule of reason, setting limits on overall energy resource concentration and on the share of some particular resource that an investor in another resource can hold, if indeed any such limit is needed at all. Such a law ought also to distinguish clearly between investment by merger and investment through internal expansion.

[From the Washington Star, Apr. 5, 1978]

FTC STAFF URGES LIMITS ON OIL FIRMS' HOLDINGS

A Federal Trade Commission staff study concludes that Congress should consider forcing some of the nation's biggest oil companies to dispose of coal and uranium reserves worth more than $100 billion, it was learned today.

The staff conclusion, which hasn't been endorsed by the commission itself, is based on the theory the energy market soon may be in the hands of a few powerful firms, stifling both competition and the development of alternative energy sources.

The staff will present its thoughts later this month to the Senate antitrust subcommittee headed by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass.

The FTC staff analysis concludes that total divestiture of oil company holdings in coal and uranium is not a viable option. A similar conclusion was reported last week by the Justice Department's anti-trust division, which suggested a percentage limitation instead of divestiture.

Basically, the FTC study will recommend that Congress pass a law limiting the amount of coal and uranium reserves which the larger oil and natural gas companies can own in given geographic market areas.

Oil companies have been buying up coal since the 1960s and today two of the four largest coal producers—Consolidation Coal and Island Creek Coal—are owned by Continental Oil and Occidental Petroleum respectively. As of 1975, 12 oil and gas companies owned more than half of all uranium reserves.

FTC officials said they have concluded there is still a good chance the various fuels can compete against each other, but that competition is endangered by the increasing involvement of oil and gas companies in the market.

This, they said, is because of a threat that oil companies with large fixed investments will have little incentive to push the development of competing fuels.

According to figures made available to United Press International:

If the oil companies were each allowed to own only 3 percent of the total coal reserves in each of three regional markets—Appalachian, Midwestern and Western—four companies, Continental, Exxon, Occidental and Shell, would have to give up more than 10 billion tons of coal worth more than $100 billion.

For the purposes of that estimate, unleased federal coal reserves are not included as part of the total reserves, which amount to about 300 billion tons. This is the limitation the staff report prefers.

If the limit were set at 5 percent, Continental and Exxon would have to sell off 4 billion tons worth more than $40 billion.

When it comes to uranium, a 3 percent limit would force Gulf, Kerr-McGee, Exxon and Getty to get rid of ore equivalent to 200 million pounds of refined uranium worth $8 billion.

A 5 percent limit for uranium holdings would force Gulf, Kerr-McGee and Exxon to divest themselves of 100 million pounds of refined uranium worth more than $5 billion.

The FTC staff has concluded that the limit should be placed on any company holding a production interest in or producing 10 million barrels of crude oil or related products worldwide in 1976.

That would cover 32 oil companies. Companies which produced 50 million cubic feet of natural gas worldwide in 1976 would also be covered—about 12 such producers.

THE DANGEROUS ILLNESS OF THE DOLLAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, for almost a year the dollar has been in a state of precipitate decline. It is a dangerous situation, not just because it feeds inflation here at home, not just because it underlines a general lack of confidence in our Government's economic policies and management, but because the dollar is the key trading currency in the world. A sick dollar can easily translate into a sick world.

A currency has no intrinsic value, which is to say that it has no worth in and of itself. A currency is a symbol of wealth and worth, and like any symbol its value depends on the interpretation of the beholder. Money is worth exactly what a person thinks it is worth, or more accurately what the whole market thinks it is worth. When the market believes money is declining in value, then goods cost more, and that is inflation. And in terms of foreign trade, inflation translates into a depreciated dollar—a dollar buys fewer marks or yen or whatever other currency.

There are other causes, but the main cause of the weakness of the dollar is that the world has little confidence in our economic policy or our economic management.

This is no small matter.

In his last public comment before leaving office, Arthur Burns urged in the most blunt and urgent language that the United States should do something to restore the strength of the dollar.

He is right.

Speculation feeds on itself, and in the present climate it has become almost a necessity to speculate in currency, if you are involved in international transactions of any kind.

In today's climate, to hold dollars is to incur a financial loss, and so those who earn dollars seek to dump them at the first and best opportunity. The downward pressure grows and builds—feeding inflation at home, and fueling still further the loss of confidence in our currency.

This is something that must be stopped.

Last January, the Treasury and the Federal Reserve made the extraordinary announcement that they would intervene in the currency markets to restore order. But the intervention, such as it was, did not stop the decline, which continued steadily. For all its practical effect, the intervention simply eased the way for speculators in the currency markets.

The fact is, market interventions do not reverse basic trends, because interventions do not change the underlying causes of market conditions.

Market interventions, unless they are accompanied by policies that change the cause of the dollar's decline, are doomed to self-defeat.

But at the same time we cannot afford to sit idly by, thinking that the dollar will eventually correct itself. The day has long since passed when anyone could believe that the money markets are self-correcting, except over the long run.

In the long run, we will all be dead. In this imperfect world, the money markets are affected by fear and greed, and by the competitive interests of governments, none of which has the interests of the United States at heart, except hopefully for our own country. If we do not have our best interests at heart, no one will carry them for us.

We have no choice but to act to protect ourselves and our interests. No one is going to act in behalf of the United States, except the United States.

It is very likely that the Germans and the Japanese, who have been buying up dollars to attenuate the fall—and thus maintain something of their competitive edge—are feeding their own inflation through this action.

Let me explain.

When the German Government buys up dollars, it must create marks in order to do this. This adds to the overall money supply, and eventually is translated into inflation in the Germany economy. Indeed, during the past several months, the German and Japanese money supply has increased by leaps and bounds. Sometime in the future the world will catch onto this, and the German and Japanese people will be caught up in an inflation of their own. The mark will cool, and so will the yen, in relation to the dollar, but the question is whether we will in the meanwhile gain control of our own situation.

That is the policy question.

Will we generate confidence in our policies and practices, or will we have a Treasury Secretary continuing to gamble with statements that actually salute the decline of the dollar, as happened a year ago?

The other question is one of time.

Will we act now, or will we wait for disaster? For it will gain us nothing if lack of confidence turns to disaster.

The President is criticized by his own Council on Wage and Stability, a horrible sign, even coming from as incompetent an agency as that.

The President is criticized by the Federal Reserve, which is infinitely worse.

And the world loses confidence.

Little wonder. The candidate who promised a balanced budget, confronted by realities and political considerations, no longer speaks of it, nor even of when the Federal deficit might be expected to start going down.

I know of no country in recent experience that has had an easy time of combating inflation. Yet those who have done so have seen their currencies recover and their confidence restored.

Our situation would be helped a great deal if the President were to make a firm stand on what his policy is going to be, and then stick to it. If people could believe that our policy, whatever it is, will be consistently and faithfully applied, there would be confidence.

Just that one thing alone would help restore the value of the dollar.

If, beyond that, our inflation is stabilized, we will be that much better off. And if our rate of inflation could be brought to a relatively lower rate than those of Germany and Japan—the problem will be over.

There is no time to waste.

We are caught up in a situation that is not only self-destructive, but self-sustaining if we leave it undisturbed. We cannot wait any longer to act, not when the dollar can drop by large amounts on the strength of a single erroneous report from an Assistant Secretary of Commerce, who happened to be misquoted, as happened yesterday. When the speculators are that nervous, something is seriously amiss.

There is a difference between a decline and a landslide. But in the financial markets, declines do become landslides unless something happens to change the market's perception of what is safe and what is not.

Today, the dollar appears less and less safe, and money being what it is, the appearance becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy. Those who buy and sell money do so for their own reason, but those reasons are primarily to make money or avoid losing it. It matters not to them what happens to the dollar, as long as they profit by whatever move is made. It is up to the United States to care about its currency. The time to care is now, and the time to act is now.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WHITE) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I missed rollcall No. 199 on Thursday afternoon, as I had to leave Washington to attend to official business in the 16th Congressional District of Texas. Had I been present for the vote on passage of the International Banking Act of 1978, I would have voted "yes." ●

HEARINGS ON U.S. REFUGEE POLICY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, this is to announce that the Subcommitee on Immigration, Citizenship, and International Law of the House Judiciary Committee will hold 1 day of public hearings on Wednesday, April 12, to receive the updated position of the Carter administration on legislation (H.R. 7175) which I have sponsored to establish a definitive U.S. policy on the admission of refugees.

These hearings have been scheduled on several occasions but were postponed each time at the request of the White House. In each instance it was indicated that administration officials would require additional time to formulate a long-term refuge policy. I am now advised that the administration has finally adopted a position, which will include detailed testimony on the aforementioned proposal, as well as interim parole programs to accommodate the various refugee problems around the world pending the enactment of refugee legislation.

This long-awaited hearing will be held in room 2141 and commence at 9:30 a.m. At that time testimony will be received from Patricia M. Derian, Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, Department of State, and Leonel J. Castillo, Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Justice.●

PROTECTING THE VICTIMS OF PROPERTY INSURANCE REDLINING

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from New York (Ms. HOLTZMAN) is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing two bills to help combat the effects of property insurance redlining. The first bill would require that State insurance pools—called FAIR plans—which provide insurance to victims of redlining must provide full homeowners coverage in addition to basic fire insurance. The second bill provides that at least one-third of the voting members of FAIR plan governing boards must be from the public—and unrelated to the insurance industry.

I am hopeful that passage of these two bills, in addition to legislation (H.R. 6749) I introduced in the last session which requires that FAIR plan rates be no higher than those in the private market, will help stop the widespread building abandonment and neighborhood deterioration which are plaguing our urban areas.

Insurance companies, like banks, practice "redlining"; they refuse to write insurance on properties in particular areas that they consider to be "high risk," even if the properties themselves are in good condition. Such determinations about risk are often arbitrary; they may be based on the racial composition of the neighborhood, the deterioration of some buildings, the economic class of residents, or mere location in the inner city. Redlining may occur in rural areas as well, because many times insurance companies will simply refuse to write insurance on homes with low market values. Property owners, thus denied, are forced to go to State FAIR plans for insurance.

FAIR plans are like assigned risk plans for auto insurance; they provide insurance to property owners who are denied insurance in the private market. These FAIR plans are insurance pools to which insurance companies contribute according to the share of property insurance they write in the State. Under a FAIR plan, property owners have a right to have their properties inspected and to obtain insurance if their property meets normal safety standards for insurability.

Unfortunately, FAIR plan coverages are almost universally more limited than those offered in the voluntary market. As a rule, the broadest plan coverage provides insurance for losses caused by fire, vandalism, and malicious mischief, and hazards listed under so-called "extended coverage"—windstorm, hail, explosion, riot and civil commotion, falling aircraft, damage by vehicle and smoke. However, traditionally the FAIR plan does not offer liability insurance or theft coverage, both of which are obviously critical to homeowners, landlords, and business people. Only Massachusetts and Rhode Island currently provide for such coverage in their FAIR plans.

Passage of the legislation I am introducing today which requires that all FAIR plans offer a complete homeowner's package—including liability and theft protection—will go far toward changing the second-class protection currently available to those who are redlined and forced into the plans. It also should help to save money for consumers in the plan, since they will be able to purchase full coverage in package form. Presently, those who are redlined must buy fire insurance separately through the FAIR plan, and then look elsewhere for crime and liability policies. They thereby lose the substantial discount—which can be as high as 20 to 40 percent—available when these coverages are purchased together in package form. In short, plan participants now pay far more for inferior coverage.

State FAIR plans also rarely have public representatives on their governing boards. At present only four states have any public members on their boards, and in only three of those do they have a vote. In the three states where the public does have a voice, it is strictly limited—in one state the public has 1 out of 15 votes, in a second state, 2 out of 9 and in the third 2 out of 7. On the other hand, the insurance industry is heavily represented, in most cases comprising the entire governing structure.

The second bill I am introducing today would require that one-third of the voting members of FAIR plan governing boards be from the public, and totally unrelated to the insurance industry. I believe such a requirement will help assure protection of consumers in the plan and the neighborhoods served by it. Given the critical impact of board decisions on the future of many neighborhoods, it is unconscionable not to allow citizens to have a voice in policies which affect them so directly. We cannot allow the current governing structure—often operating as little more than an industry clique—to continue. Public accountability is essential.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing today will do much to remedy the abuses suffered by the victims of insurance company redlining. Together with H.R. 6749, my bill to limit exorbitant FAIR plan rates, these two bills would allow those unfortunate enough to be redlined to purchase full insurance coverage at reasonable rates and would assure that FAIR plan decisions affecting communities are made with sufficient input from the members of the public affected.

I urge their prompt passage.

REPRESSION OF HELSINKI WATCHERS IN THE U.S.S.R. CONTINUES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, systematic repression of the Helsinki watchers in the U.S.S.R. continues unabated. Last Thursday, according to press reports from Moscow, Pyotr Vins, one of the newest members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Watch Group, was sentenced in Kiev to 1 year in labor camp on the charge of "parasitism," an accusation commonly leveled against human rights activists who lost their jobs and were unable to find other work because of their activism. Vins joins his colleagues in the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote Observance of the Helsinki Accords as the latest victim of official reprisal: of the 14 members of the Group, 5 (Mykola Rudenko, Olsksiy Tykhy, Mykola Matusevych, Myroslav Marynovych, and now Pyotr Vins) has been tried and sentenced, one (Levko Lukyanenko) is awaiting trial, and one (Pyotr Grigorenko) has been permanently exiled from his country.

Pyotr Vins, the son of the imprisoned Baptist pastor Georgi Vins, was in the process of applying to emigrate to Canada to join relatives there when he was arrested in mid-February. Although only 23 years old, young Vins had already paid a stiff price for his activities: he was denied the opportunity of a higher education and was twice detained for 15-day periods in December 1977. Now, Soviet authorities have extracted another toll—a year in labor camp. I ask my colleagues in the Congress to join in saluting this courageous young man. I know my colleagues will join me in urging the immediate release of Pyotr Vins and the other imprisoned Helsinki watchers in the U.S.S.R.

I make this request not just in severe criticism of the action itself but also in astonishment that a strong people and government are so sensitive or fearful or that their beliefs are so weak that they feel they must take such strong punitive action against individuals who are simply asking their government to live up to its own promises.●

ERA RATIFICATION: THE CASE FOR A 7-YEAR EXTENSION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. DRINAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DRINAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to register my strong support for House Joint Resolution 638, which would extend the time available for ratification of the equal rights amendment by an additional 7 years.

My decision to support this measure was not hastily made. I listened carefully to the testimony of several distinguished witnesses—some of our country's best legal minds—and studied their written statements at length. The hearings on House Joint Resolution 638 were held by the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, of which I am a member.

Some critics of this extension are using that familiar refrain: You are changing the rules of the game just before the end of the last quarter. Actually, this "game" we are now engaged in is the legitimate use of our constitutional process. I would like to share with my colleagues how, upon careful reflection, I have come to view this process.

I will not go into why we need an equal rights amendment. The Congress 7 years ago, by a vote of 354 to 24 in the House and 84 to 8 in the Senate, passed the joint resolution proposing the amendment. I would like, however, to speak about the reasons why we need an additional 7 years for ratification.

We need to permit full and fair consideration of this amendment, which has turned out to be more complex than the Congress first contemplated. We need to be fair to the 35 States, representing 71 percent of our population, which have ratified the amendment. We need to be fair to those who have been confused by some of the misleading propaganda which has been circulated during this national debate.

Thus, there is a need for the extension. The question then becomes does Congress have the authority to make such an extension?

Article V of the Constitution, the amending article, gives Congress the power to propose amendments and to determine the mode of ratification. The Supreme Court has determined that Congress also has the implied power under article V to impose a time limitation on the ratification process. The only limit placed upon the Congress is that the ratification must occur within a "reasonable time" after the amendment is proposed. Who decides what a "reasonable time" is? The Supreme Court has said that Congress decides, since the factors to be weighed in making the decision are political judgments involving political, social, and economic considerations. And the Supreme Court has held that Congress can decide what a reasonable time is either at the beginning (at the time of proposing the amendment) or at the end (at the time of promulgating the ratified amendment) of the process. There is certainly no reason why Congress should not be allowed to exercise its judgment as to the reasonableness of the time in the middle of the process as well.

The next problem that confronts us is whether a two-thirds vote, or only a simple majority, is needed to pass the resolution providing for the extension.

The Constitution clearly specifies when a supermajority vote is required. Article V requires a two-thirds vote for action by Congress only in proposing an amendment. While article V also authorizes Congress to determine the mode of ratification, it does not specify that a two-thirds vote is needed for this determination. The Supreme Court has found that Congress may also determine the period to be allowed for ratification and other incidental details associated with its power to designate the mode of ratification. Since there is, of course, no specific requirement that a two-thirds vote is needed for these actions, it follows that a simple majority vote is sufficient.

A question that may be asked is whether extending the time limitation is an incidental detail or a matter of substance concerned with proposing the amendment. Traditionally, the test has been to look to the form of the original time limitation. If it was placed in the body of the amendment, it is considered a substantive matter and cannot be changed. If the time limit is in the proposing clause of the amendment, as it was in the case of the equal rights amendment, it is an exercise by Congress of one of its incidental powers and can be changed by a simple majority vote, just as it could have been set by a simple majority vote in the first place. (The fact that the adoption of the amendment and the incidental setting of the time limit were voted on together as a matter of convenience does not alter the fact that the latter could have been passed separately by a simple majority.) As the Department of Justice legal opinion stated:

> By placing the time period in the proposing resolution rather than in the text of the amendment, the 92d Congress effectively decided that the proposal should remain viable for at least seven years without barring a subsequent Congress from making a more informed judgment at a later time as to the reasonableness of the time period for ratification of the ERA.

Some criticize this approach of determining the required vote by looking to see whether the limitation was in the body of the amendment as evidencing a preoccupation with form. I do not, however, see any reason to depart from the general rule in this case. There was certainly nothing sacred, or even meaningful, about the original 7-year limit. It was set because 7 years was thought to be the "customary" time limit. (Actually, most of our proposed amendments throughout history have not had any designated time limits.)

The argument has been advanced that we should not change the time limit because the States which have already ratified the ERA did so relying upon the fact that there would be a March 1979 deadline. This makes no sense to me for three reasons. First, the possibility of such reliance is purely speculative and conjectural. Second, during the debates over the adoption of our Constitution, James Madison advanced the widely accepted idea that a State's ratification must be unconditional and irrevocable; thus, no State could have made its ratification conditional on the deadline remaining firm. Third, the States never saw the proposing clause with the time limit; they just saw, and were voting on, the actual amendment, which read:

Section 1. Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Section 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Section 3. This amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification.

The last question which I would like to consider is whether a 7-year extension would be a reasonable one. Ruth Bader Ginsburg, distinguished professor at Columbia Law School, testified before our Judiciary Subcommittee as follows:

Social and economic conditions in the period 1972 to the present demonstrate the vitality of the issue to which the Equal Rights Amendment responds. Recognition of the equality of men and women before the law, far from diminishing in significance to the nation, is today an ideal attracting widespread and constant attention.

The debate on the Equal Rights Amendment, far more complex than those attending other recent amendments, has not run its course and should be allowed to continue. The proposed amendment remains a matter of urgent public concern. Thus, Congress would be acting responsibly in extending its initial "reasonable time" estimate.

And Prof. Thomas Emerson of Yale Law School has put it well:

History has demonstrated that a long period of time is necessary for the nation to make up its mind with respect to fundamental changes in the status of large groups in the population. Thus the Women's Suffrage Amendment was under consideration for nearly three quarters of a century. . . . Even the abolition of slavery, eventually accomplished by the Thirteenth Amendment, was a subject of national debate for decades. The Equal Rights Amendment was originally proposed in 1923. . . . It was not until 1970 that the merits of the Equal Rights Amendment began to achieve serious national attention. The seven years which have since lapsed constitute a very brief period for discussion of such a major social reform.

I believe the thinking of these scholars makes it clear that the 7-year figure is a reasonable one. The vitality of this burning issue will obviously not die out before 1986. We need to provide a comfortable, tension-free timeframe in which the amendment's advocates and opponents will have sufficient opportunity to clarify their positions and clear up misunderstandings. Seven additional years seems to me a good estimate of the amount of time that is needed. It is certainly not an unreasonable figure. It is certainly within the "rules of the game." ●

PRESSURE BUILDS IN HOUSE FOR SOCIAL SECURITY TAX CUT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BURKE) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on April 5, the Democratic Caucus overwhelmingly passed a resolution introduced by myself and my distinguished colleagues, Messrs. STARK and MILLER of California. The resolution requests immediate action on general revenue participation in financing a portion of the growing social security system costs.

While the caucus was meeting to discuss this resolution, Ms. Alice Rivlin, Director of the Congressional Budget Office, was testifying before the Social Security Subcommittee of the Senate Finance Committee. Her testimony provides further evidence of the rationality, the progressivity and the desirability of the legislation I have introduced, with the support of 150 cosponsors, to finance the social security system with a one-third contribution from general revenue funds.

It is indeed unfortunate that the many duties and pressing obligations required of the Members prevented them from witnessing Director Rivlin's analysis of the various tax reduction plans—both payroll and income tax related. For the benefit of my colleagues I would like to include in the RECORD an excellent summary of Ms. Rivlin's instructive comments, from the April 8, 1978, edition of Congressional Quarterly.

As the article points out, my bill, H.R. 10668, is to date the most progressive tax reduction plan before the Congress. I cannot help but recall that during the debate on the general revenue resolution before the caucus my plan for social security refinancing was challenged for its lack of progressivity. I commend for the edification of such critics the Congressional Budget Office analysis provided by Director Rivlin's testimony. In fact, it also comes to mind that the Joint Committee on Taxation, of which I am a member, has found that the increasing social security payroll tax is actually reducing the overall progressivity of the Federal tax system.

The prepared statement of Director Rivlin is also informative on another related issue not mentioned in the Congressional Quarterly piece. That issue is inflation, and the Congressional Budget Office assessment is that the one-third general revenue financing proposal would have a significant impact on price stability. Again, it is ironic that the beneficial effect H.R. 10668 would have on inflation should come out in a Senate subcommittee hearings while opponents of general fund participation in the House were at virtually the same moment protesting that this is not the way to tackle the insidious inflation problem.

Mr. Speaker, I raise these points because I believe the time has come to uncover the infirmities underlying the shopworn, trite, and insubstantial grounds proffered by those who oppose general fund participation in social security. The proposal is sound. It makes economic sense. It is progressive. It is a rational approach to a very difficult issue involving many hard and complex policy considerations. Certainly it is not a panacea—I am the first to admit that there are problems, as with any such major proposal. Nevertheless, it is the best alternative at our disposal, and I am confident that through the legislative process many of these problems can be overcome.

The article follows:

PRESSURE BUILDS IN HOUSE FOR SOCIAL SECURITY TAX CUT

(By Christopher R. Conte)

The House Budget Committee and the House Democratic Caucus went on record April 4–5 in support of rolling back planned Social Security tax increases.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long, D–La. and President Carter both repeated their opposition to a change in the Social Security law, however, leaving the outcome of the tax debate still uncertain.

BUDGET COMMITTEE ACTION

The Budget Committee, beginning markup of the first fiscal 1979 budget resolution, approved on April 4 a proposal by its chairman, Robert N. Giaimo, D-Conn., calling for a $7.5 billion reduction in payroll taxes in fiscal 1979.

It further proposed that general revenues in that amount be injected into the Social Security system to make up the loss.

Under the chairman's proposal, the Social Security tax rate could drop back to its 1977 level—5.85 percent—while the wage base would return to what it would have been before Congress approved increases in 1977. That would mean a wage base of $18,900 in 1979.

That compares to a scheduled tax of 6.13 percent on wages up to $22,900 under the present law.

Before acting on the chairman's recommendation, the committee rejected a more modest Republican proposal pushed by Rep. Barber B. Conable, Jr., R-N.Y. He suggested using $3.2 billion in general revenues to offset Social Security tax increases scheduled under the 1977 law. That proposal would allow increases planned under previous law to take effect.

Conable's proposal would have resulted in a tax rate in 1979 of 6.05 percent on wages up to $18,900.

DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS

After trying unsuccessfully to put the party on record favoring a rollback March 15, House Democrats finally managed to get a quorum for a caucus April 5. The result was a 150–57 vote in favor of a resolution urging the Ways and Means Committee to propose the use of general revenues to forestall Social Security tax increases. (Previous action.)

The caucus took that action despite the opposition of House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., D-Mass., and Ways and Means Committee Chairman Al Ullman, D-Ore.

"You are making not only a mistake, but a very disastrous mistake," Ullman said. "You're building into the Social Security" system the seeds on its destruction.

Ullman warned that allowing the use of general revenues to pay Social Security benefits would enable Congress to increase benefits and pay for them through federal deficit spending.

Noting that middle and upper income families will pay the bulk of the scheduled Social Security tax increases, he also accused the caucus of playing "the worst kind of politics."

The middle class executive group and the commentators and columnists are the only ones who are giving you heat, he said in response to assertions that Congress is under considerable public pressure to roll back Social Security tax hikes.

"We're suggesting that a piece of the [1978 tax] cut be in the most regressive, inflationary tax there is," countered Ways and Means member Abner J. Mikva, D-Ill., in arguing for a rollback.

SENATE HEARINGS

In the meantime, the Social Security Subcommittee of the Senate Finance Committee received testimony April 5 from Treasury Secretary W. Michael Blumenthal reiterating the administration's opposition to a rollback.

He was supported by Long, who urged the administration not to give in on the issue. If Carter were to approve "irresponsible" policies, Long warned, conservatives and moderates in Congress might protest by refusing to increase the federal debt limit.

Rivlin Testimony. Congressional Budget Office (CBO) Director Alice M. Rivlin also testified April 5. Assessing alternative tax programs, she said a proposal that general revenues pay one-third of all Social Security costs would be most progressive, followed by Carter's tax program. The proposal for general revenue financing of health and disability insurance would be least progressive, she said. (Details, Weekly Report pp. 681, 164)

Under the one-third general revenue financing plan, 20.5 percent of all benefits would go to people earning less than $10,000, compared to 19.3 percent under Carter's program and 18.8 percent under the other approach.

People earning between $10,000 and $20,000 would receive 44.2 percent of the benefits under a one-third general revenue financing, 47.7 percent under Carter's program and 48.4 percent under the proposed general revenue financing of health and disability insurance.

People earning more than $20,000 would receive 31.1 percent of the benefits under a one-third general revenue financing plan; 33 percent under Carter's program; and 37 percent under the health-and-disability insurance general revenue financing scheme.

If the proposal to pay for health and disability insurance with general revenues were substituted for Carter's program, all families except those with earned incomes between $10,000 and $20,000 with two or more dependents would be better off. Single persons with earned income below $35,000 would be better off, according to Rivlin.

If the one-third general revenue financing idea were substituted for Carter's program, gainers would include: all two-earner families except those with earned incomes between $10,000 and $15,000 with two or more dependents; all one-earner families except those with incomes over $30,000 and those with two dependents and earned incomes between $9,000 and $14,000; and single persons with earned incomes below $30,000.●

U.S. SUPREME COURT UPHOLDS CONGRESS RIGHT TO CURTAIL GI BILL ABUSES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from Texas (Mr. TEAGUE) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, during the 94th Congress, the Subcommittee on Education and Training of which I am chairman, held a number of oversight hearings on veterans education overpayments and abuses in Veterans' Administration educational programs and the GI bill. Our subcommittee was told that the Veterans' Administration educational overpayments had skyrocketed from practically nothing in 1970 to over $1.8 billion in 1976. Even worse, there was evidence that veterans were ripping off the Federal Government for untold millions of dollars because of a number of practices which had crept into the program. For example, in some schools veterans rarely, if ever, attended classes, failed to make progress, other schools failed to provide competent instructors or material, while some schools were referred to as "diploma mills." Advertising emphasized primarily the financial reward to the veteran rather than any vocational or educational benefits to be derived. The Veterans' Administration told our subcommittee that the law had to be tightened up to be effective in combating these abuses.

On the basis of our subcommittee's oversight hearings and information obtained by other means, the 94th Congress approved a number of provisions contained in Public Law 94–502, the Veterans Education and Employment Act of 1976. The purpose of these tightening amendments was to assure the veteran receives quality education while at the same time being fair to the educational institutions and to keep the taxpayer from being ripped off.

One of these tightening provisions is referred to as the 85–15 rule. The 85–15 rule provides that the enrollment of an eligible veteran may not be approved for any course for a period during which more than 85 percent of the students enrolled are having all or part of their tuition paid for by the Veterans' Administration. Educational institutions have severely criticized the 85–15 rule and called for the repeal of this provision.

The 85–15 rule has been denounced as unconstitutional and described as an infringement on the rights of educational institutions to educate.

It was no surprise, therefore, that shortly after Public Law 94–502 was approved that the 85–15 rule, as well as the 2-year rule, which requires a course at a branch or extension to be in operation for 2 years or longer to be approved for veterans, was challenged in a Federal court. Initially, the U.S. district court held in favor of the school. On March 20, 1978, the U.S. Supreme Court reversed the U.S. district court ruling. The Supreme Court therefore has upheld the constitutionality of the tightening provisions in the GI bill, and made it clear that it is an appropriate exercise of congressional judgment as to how best to combat abuses.

So that the Members will have the benefit of the reasoning in this case, I insert a copy of the decision entitled: "Max Cleland, Administrator of the Veterans Administration, et al. v. National College of Business, No. 77–716, Decided March 20, 1978," be made a part of my remarks, together with a copy of a press clipping from the Washington Post of March 21, 1978 entitled: "Court Cements Congress' G.I. Bill Grip."

The material follows:

[Supreme Court of the United States]

MAX CLELAND, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE VETERANS ADMINISTRATION, ET AL. v. NATIONAL COLLEGE OF BUSINESS

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF SOUTH DAKOTA

No. 77–716. Decided March 20, 1978

PER CURIAM.

The question presented is whether the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment prohibits Congress from restricting the educational courses for which veterans' benefits are available under the GI Bill [1] without including identical course limitations in other federal educational assistance programs.

A veteran seeking educational assistance benefits must file an application with the Administrator of the Veterans Administration. Before approving the application, the Administrator must determine whether the veteran's proposed educational program satisfies various requirements, including the so-called 85–15 requirement and the two-year rule.

The 85–15 requirement requires the Administrator to disapprove an application if the veteran enrolls in a course in which more than 85% of the students "are having all or part of their tuition, fees, or other charges paid to or for them by the educational institution, by the Veterans Administration . . . and/or by grants from any Federal agency." [2] The Administrator, however, may waive the requirement if he determines that it would be in the interest of both the veteran and the Federal Government.

The two-year rule requires the Administrator to disapprove the enrollment of an eligible veteran in a course that has been offered by a covered educational institution for less than two years. The rule applies to courses offered at branches and extensions of proprietary educational institutions located beyond the normal commuting distance of the institution.[3]

Appellee National College of Business is a proprietary educational institution which has extension programs in several States. Most of its courses have a veteran enrollment of 85% or more. Appellee is therefore affected by both the 85–15 requirement and the two-year rule.

Appellee brought this action in the United States District Court for the District of South Dakota, challenging the constitutionality of the restrictions.[4] Appellee contended that the restrictions arbitrarily denied otherwise eligible veterans of educational benefits and denied veterans equal protection because they were not made applicable to persons whose educations were being subsidized under other federal edu-

[1] The various provisions dealing with veterans' benefits are contained in Title 38 of the United States Code. 38 U.S.C. § 1651 et seq. relate specifically to the veterans' educational assistance program. While the term GI Bill is often used to describe veterans' benefits legislation generally, for purposes of this opinion it refers to legislation dealing specifically with veterans' educational assistance benefits.

[2] 38 U.S.C. § 1673(d), as amended by § 205 of Pub. L. 94–502. While this appeal was pending, the 85–15 requirement was amended in several respects. See § 305(a) of the GI Bill Improvement Act of 1977, Pub. L. 95–202. However, the amendments have not made the requirement inapplicable to appellee's students.

[3] See 38 U. S. C. § 1789, as amended by § 509 of Pub. L. 502, 90 Stat. 24051. The rule was recently amended by § 305(a) of the GI Bill Improvement Act of 1977, Pub. L. 95–202. The amendment authorizes the Administrator to waive the two-year rule if he determines that it would be in the interest of the veteran and the Federal Government. The Administrator, however, does not suggested that the rule will be waived with respect to appellee's students.

cational assistance programs.[5] The District Court held the 85–15 requirement and the two-year rule unconstitutional and permanently enjoined their enforcement. We reserve.[6]

I

The course restrictions challenged by appellee evolved in response to problems experienced in the administration of earlier versions of the veterans' educational assistance program. When extension of the World War GI Bill to veterans of the Korean War was under consideration by Congress in 1952, the House Select Committee to Investigate Educational Training and Loan Guarantee Programs under the GI Bill studied the problems that had arisen under the earlier program. The Committee's work led to passage of the first version of the 85–15 requirement, which applied only to nonaccredited courses not leading to a college degree that were offered by proprietary institutions. Pub. L. 82–550.66 Stat. 667.

The purpose of the requirement is not disputed:

"Congress was concerned about schools which developed courses specifically designed for those veterans with available Federal moneys to purchase such courses. . . . The ready availability of these funds obviously served as a strong incentive to some schools to enroll eligible veterans. The requirement of a minimum enrollment of students not wholly or partially subsidized by the Veterans' Administration was a way of protecting veterans by allowing the free market mechanism to operate.

"The price of the course was also required to respond to the general demands of the open market as well as to those with available Federal moneys to spend. A minimal number of nonveterans were required to find the course worthwhile and valuable or the payment of Federal funds to veterans who enrolled would not be authorized." S. Rep. No. 94–1243, 94th Cong., 2d Sess., 88 (1976).

These same considerations prompted extension of the requirement in 1974 to courses not leading to a standard college degree offered by accredited institutions. § 203 (3) of Pub. L. 93–508, 88 Stat. 1582. See also S. Rep. No. 94–1243, supra, at 88.

In 1976 the 85–15 requirement was further extended to courses leading to a standard college degree. The Veterans' Administration had found increased recruiting by institutions within this category "directed exclusively at veterans." In recommending approval of the extension, the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee agreed with the Veterans' Administration that " 'if an institution of higher learning cannot attract sufficient nonveteran and nonsubsidized students to its programs, it presents a great potential for abuse of our GI educational programs.' " S. Rep. No. 94–1243, supra, at 89. The Committee further noted that, in view of the magnitude of the expenditures under the GI Bill, it was essential "to limit those situations in which substantial abuse could occur." Ibid. Finally, the Committee emphasized that "the requirement that no more than 85 percent of the student body be in receipt of VA benefits is not onerous particularly given the fact that under today's GI Bill . . . veterans do not comprise a major portion of those attending institutions of higher learning. . . ." Ibid.[7]

The two-year rule is also a product of Congress' judgment regarding potential abuses of the veterans' educational assistance program based upon experience with administration of earlier versions of the GI Bill. Thus, following World War II schools and courses developed "which were almost exclusively aimed at veterans eligible for GI bill payments." S. Rep. No. 94–1243, supra, at 128. In response, the first version of the rule was enacted. It barred the payment of in operation less than one year. Pub. L. 81–266, 63 Stat. 653. As with the 85–15 requirement, the rule "was a device intended by Congress to allow the free market mechanism to operate and weed out those institutions who could survive only by the heavy influx of Federal payments." S. Rep. No. 94–1243, supra, at 128.

Following the Korean War, Congress amended the rule to cover courses that had not been in operation for at least two years. Section 227 of the Korean Conflict GI Bill, Pub. L. 82–550, 66 Stat. 667. In its report accompanying the amendment, the House Veterans' Affairs Committee characterized the rule as "a real safeguard to assure sound training for veterans at reasonable cost by seasoned institutions" and observed that had the rule been in effect during the administration of the World War II GI Bill "considerable savings would have resulted and much better training would have resulted in many areas." H.R. Rep. No. 1943, 82d Cong., 2d Sess., 30 (1952).

In 1976, Congress again amended the two-year rule, making it applicable to, among other institutions, branches of private institutions such as appellee that are located beyond the normal commuting distance from the main institution. The considerations underlying the extended coverage are fully set forth in the report of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee accompanying the legislation. S. Rep. No. 94–1243, supra. There had been a "spectacular" rise in both the number of institutions establishing branch campuses and in the veteran enrollment at those extensions. These institutions were entering into "extensive recruiting contracts directed almost exclusively at veterans." Id., at 129. In a report dealing with the problems generated by these developments, the Veterans Administration had stated:

"[A] number of instances have been brought to our attention which represent abuse of our educational programs. Some of these cases involved contracting between nonprofit schools and profit schools or organizations whereby courses designed by the latter are offered by the nonprofit, accredited school on a semester or quarter-hour basis. In others, there are arrangements between nonprofit, accredited schools and outside profit firms whereby the latter, for a percentage of the tuition payment, perform recruitng services primarily for the establishing of these branch locations for the school. These recruiting efforts are aimed almost exclusively at veterans." Ibid.[8]

In recommending adoption of the amendment, the Committee concluded that the situation presented "great potential for abuse and in several instances that potential appear[ed] to have been realized." Id., at 130.

II

As the legislative history demonstrates, the 85–15 requirement and the two-year rule are valid exercises of Congress' power. Experience with administration of the veterans' educational assistance program since World War II revealed a need for legislation that would minimize the risk that veterans' benefits would be wasted on educational programs of little value. It was not irrational for Congress to conclude that restricting benefits to established courses that have attracted a substantial number of students whose educations are not being subsidized would be useful in accomplishing this objective and "prevent charlatans from grabbing the veteran's education money." Both restrictions are based upon the rational assumption that if "the free market mechanism [were allowed] to operate," it would "weed out those institutions who could survive only by the heavy influx of Federal payments." S. Rep. No. 94–1243, supra, at 128.

The otherwise reasonable restrictions are not made irrational by virtue of their absence from other federal educational assistance programs. They were imposed in direct response to problems experienced in the administration of this Country's GI bills. There is no indication that identical abuses have been encountered in other federal grant programs. In any event, the Constitution does not require Congress to detect and correct abuses in the administration of all related programs before acting to combat those experienced in one. For, "[e]vils in the same field may be of different dimensions and proportions, requiring different remedies. Or so the legislature may think. Or the reform may take one step at a time, addressing itself to the phase of the problem which seems most acute to the legislative mind. The legislatures may select one phase of one field and apply a remedy there, neglecting the others. The prohibition of the Equal Protection Clause [generally] goes no further. . . ." Williamson v. Lee Optical Co., 348 U.S. 483, 489.

When tested by their rationality, therefore, the 85–15 requirement and the two-year rule are plainly proper exercises of Congress' authority. While agreeing that the restrictions were rationally related to legitimate legislative objectives, the District Court concluded that veterans' educational benefits approach "fundamental and personal rights" and therefore a more "elevated standard of review" was appropriate. Subjecting the 85–15 and two-year requirements to this heightened scrutiny, the court observed that they were not precisely tailored to prevent federal expenditures on [5] Joining appellee as plaintiffs in the District Court were four veterans who were students or former students at the National College of Business. The court held they lacked standing because they had not demonstrated how they would be affected by the restrictions. The court, however, held that appellee who would suffer serious economic harm from application of the restrictions to its students, had standing under the jus tertii doctrine to assert the constitutional claims of its students. Neither of the court's standing rulings are challenged in this Court.

[6] Appellee advanced several other theories of unconstitutionality in the District Court and reasserts two of them in this Court: (1) the restrictions violate substantive due process because they interfere with freedom of educational choice, and (2) they violate procedural due process because the affected veterans are not afforded a hearing on the question whether the requirements should be applied or waived. The District Court characterized these contentions as less meritorious than the equal protection claim. We agree. Neither raises a substantial constitutional question.

[7] The 1976 amendments also changed the computation base of the 85–15 requirement, for the first time including students subsidized under other federal assistance programs within the 85 percent calculation. This change, however, was recently modified by Congress to exclude from the 85 percent quota students receiving federal assistance from sources other than the Veterans' Administration, until such time as the Administrator has completed a study regarding the need for and feasibility of including them within the 85 percent computation. Section 305(a) of the GI Bill Improvement Act of 1977, Pub. L. 95–202. This change has no bearing on this case because appellee has a veteran enrollment of more than 85 percent.

courses of little value. Since some quality courses would be affected by the restrictions, the court held them unconstitutional.

The District Court's error was not its recognition of the importance of veterans' benefits but its failure to give appropriate deference to Congress' judgment as to how best to combat abuses that had arisen in the administration of those benefits. Legislative precision has never been constitutionally required in cases of this kind.[9]

"The basic principle that must govern an assessment of any constitutional challenge to a law providing for governmental payments of monetary benefits is well established. Governmental decisions to spend money to improve the general public welfare in one way and not another are 'not confided to the courts. The discretion belongs to Congress, unless the choice is clearly wrong, a display of arbitrary power, not an exercise of judgment.' . . . In enacting legislation of this kind a government does not deny equal protection 'merely because the classifications made by its laws are imperfect. If the classification has some "reasonable basis" it does not offend the Constitution simply because the classification "is not made with mathematical nicety or because in practice it results in some inequality."' Dandridge v. Williams, 397 U.S. 471, 485." Mathews v. DeCastro, 429 U.S. 181, 185.

Since it was rational for Congress to conclude that established courses with a substantial enrollment of nonsubsidized students were more likely to be quality courses, the 85–15 and two-year requirements satisfy "the constitutional test normally applied in cases like this." Califano v. Jobst, — U.S., —.

The judgment is reversed.

MAX CLELAND, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE VETERANS ADMINISTRATION. ET AL v. NATIONAL COLLEGE OF BUSINESS

ON APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF SOUTH DAKOTA

No. 77–716. Decided March 20, 1978

Mr. JUSTICE MARSHALL.

I believe that substantial constitutional questions are presented by appellee's due process claims, see ante, n. 6, as well as by its equal protection claim. I would therefore note probable jurisdiction and set this case for oral argument.

COURT CEMENTS CONGRESS' GI BILL GRIP

(By Morton Mintz)

Congress can try to prevent abuse of veterans' benefits by restricting the eligibility of educational courses under the GI bill, the Supreme Court ruled yesterday.

The case centered on 1976 legislation requiring the Veterans Administration to enforce a so-called "85–15 requirement" and a "two-year rule."

Under 85–15, the VA must deny benefits to veterans for courses in which federal agencies pay all or part of the expenses of more than 85 per cent of the students. The government theory is that a course enrolling fewer than 15 privately paying students out of 100 may not be legitimate.

Under the two-year rule, the VA must disapprove a veteran's enrollment in a course that has been offered for less than two-years by, among others, a commercial educational institution at a branch beyond normal commuting distance from its main classrooms.

The VA can waive either rule in the interest of both government and veterans.

Last June, federal Judge Andrew W. Bogue of South Dakota held that the legislation denies the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Constitution. He termed it "overkill" that would eliminate fraud and waste "at the cost of eliminating quality educational opportunities for veterans."

The Supreme Court reversed 8 to 1 saying that the legislation, based on experience with programs offered to World War II GIs, was an appropriate exercise of Congress' "judgment as to how best to combat abuses . . ." Justice Thurgood Marshall wanted to hear argument in the case.

The case involved the National College of Business, based in Rapid City S.D., which says it invested at least $680,000 in courses designed mainly for veterans. Veterans' enrollment in most of its courses exceed 85 percent.

Judge Bogue said 85–15 imposed an "obnoxious" double standard. In calculating the 85 per cent recipients of all federal education benefits are lumped together, he said. But in approving courses, "the drawing of class lines suddenly changes; then veterans stand alone to be cut off from benefit."

The Supreme Court said his "error" was in failing to defer to the judgment of Congress as to how to treat the situation.

In a friend-of-the-court brief, the Association of Independent Colleges and Schools, composed of about 500 private business schools, said the two-year rule violates freedom of expression and association.●

[9] Appellee contends that the challenged restrictions will completely deprive some veterans—those who live in areas where there are no programs which satisfy the two requirements—of veterans' educational assistance. While the restrictions on their face simply channel veterans toward courses which Congress has determined are more likely to be worthwhile, they may in fact operate to make benefits functionally unavailable to some veterans not living in close proximity to schools offering qualified programs and unwilling or unable to move to take advantage of the federal assistance. Nevertheless, the fact that Congress' judgment may deprive some veterans of the opportunity to take full advantage of the benefits made available to veterans by Congress is not a sufficient basis for greater judicial oversight of that judgment. As the Court noted in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1, 35, "the undisputed importance of education will not alone cause this Court to depart from the usual standard for reviewing . . . social and economic legislation."

SENATE—Monday, April 10, 1978

(Legislative day of Monday, February 6, 1978)

The Senate met at 8:45 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, in executive session, and was called to order by Hon. KANEASTER HODGES, JR., a Senator from the State of Arkansas.

PRAYER

O Lord, our God, we thank Thee for the blessed assurance that we are not called upon to face our duties alone or in our own strength, but at all times we may be accompanied by Thy presence. We ask for Thy nearness, Thy wisdom, and Thy strength that we may be our best selves, fortified by Thy grace. Even amid the pressure of daily duty may there come to us the hush of solemn thoughts, vistas of splendor, windows of insight, when the shadows fade and the clouds of uncertainty vanish and the inner eyes of the soul see clearly the course we should pursue. Breathe through the things that are seen the peace of the unseen and the eternal. So may we hasten Thy coming kingdom as we seek the highest and best for the Nation.

And to Thee shall be the praise and thanksgiving. Amen.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATIES—REACTIONS IN PANAMA

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have a series of translations of reports from the Panama news media, both the printed and the oral media, concerning discussions that have been going on in Panama about the actions of the U.S. Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that these translations of articles which appeared in those media from March 20 through April 5, 1978, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the translations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TORRIJOS CALLS FOR MEETING TO STUDY TREATY SITUATION

Our chief of government, Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera, today convened a meeting of the National Foreign Policy Council [consejo nacional de politica exterior] in order to study the new situation that has arisen regarding the ratification of the canal treaties by the United States.

The meeting took place at Farallon. During the meeting it was pointed out that the reservations and amendments to the neutrality treaty approved with 68 votes in favor and 32 against in the U.S. Senate have been analyzed on the following basic principles that Omar stated in a letter sent to President James Carter hours before the treaty was voted on: Any reservation that may represent a blemish to national dignity or that alters or changes the objectives of the treaty or that is aimed at blocking the true exercise of Panamanian sovereignty over all territory will be unacceptable to Panama. Our government will not pass judgment on the amendments and reservations, made to the Torrijos-Carter treaties until the U.S. Senate concludes the ratification process, since our people did not ratify the treaties separately but together.

At a forthcoming meeting in which the members of the Council of State and our ambassador to the United States will participate, the policy to be followed in face of the new situation that the most conservative sectors in the United States are creating around the ratification of the treaties that give our country control over the Canal Zone before the year 2000 will be discussed. This is what policy based on principles means.

The spirit of the Panamanian revolutionary process is flexible, it is broadminded and patient, but our people and the revolutionary government have principles that are not abstract but arise from the blood shed by our martyrs in order to eradicate the colonist from the fatherland.

Treaties are a peaceful solution sought by us in order to prevent a high social cost for liberation. However, our sentiments and our flexibility must not be confused with something else. The attitude of our people is reflected in Omar's watchword: "Either on our feet or dead, but never kneeling."

NEGOTIATORS ESCOBAR, ROYO HOLD PRESS CONFERENCE

Romulo Escobar Bethancourt and Aristides Royo, who were part of Panama's treaty negotiating team, met this afternoon with the local press to report on the status of the new Panama Canal treaties which are midway in the process of ratification by the United States.

Escobar and Royo explained that we are experiencing a moment which is not one of euphoria but neither is it one of defeat. They asked press, radio and television newsmen to help the government maintain an atmosphere of calm and watchful waiting. They explained the differences between the amendments and the reservations by the U.S. Senate to the international agreements. Amendments change an article of the pacts totally while reservations are Senate opinions which are added to the pacts and are only obligatory when they are accepted by the other country in the exchange of instruments of ratification.

Escobar indicated that a reservation such as the one presented yesterday by Sen. Dennis DeConcini and approved by the Senate may oblige Panama to present its own reservations when the instruments of ratification are exchanged. For this reason, the Panamanian Government has decided not to make any statement until the Senate decides on the second treaty, the canal treaty.

At that time, the Panamanian Government will analyze each and every one of the amendments and reservations and will take a position.

However, Royo said, if the Senate continues whittling away at the treaties as it has done so far, it may turn out that Panama will have to tell the world that there are no new canal treaties.

Both negotiators agreed that the canal pact itself, which contains a series of revindications of an economic nature for Panama, will be much more difficult for the U.S. Senate. Royo pointed out: The neutrality treaty was easy for them and very hard for us. Now comes the treaty which is hard for them and good for us. That canal treaty has still not been subjected to discussion and already has 27 amendment proposals. Until the Senate makes a decision, the atmosphere in Panama should be one of calm, never one of frustration or defeat. There should be an atmosphere of analysis without reaching states of despair.

Among the measures adopted to maintain the atmosphere of calm is the postponement of the beginning of classes until 17 April. Escobar explained that the objectives of the conservative senators are to defeat the treaties or to lead Panama to another plebiscite and also to cause problems in Panama by exasperating the people by offending them. Escobar said we will have to endure those provocations because the most important thing now is the treaties' approval. Our irritation in this case is of secondary importance

Escobar pointed out that one of the articles of the canal treaty which will be torpedoed by the senators is the one referring to the sea level canal. He explained that Panama never wanted this article and that General Torrijos himself said it was equivalent to a second marriage by the same couple.

FURTHER REPORT

Panamanian negotiators Aristides Royo and Romulo Escobar Bethancourt held a news conference at 1430 with local newsmen in the offices of the Cerro Colorado Corporation located in the National Bank Building to explain the position of the Panamanian Government.

Royo said that the position of the Panamanian Government at this crucial moment in the history of the nation is prudent, wise and politically adequate. He added that the neutrality treaty has some aspects which are hard for the Panamanian people to accept. However, he added, it is the treaty by which the United States returns the Panama Canal to Panama which really contains concessions favorable to the Panamanian people. Therefore, in the opinion of the negotiators, this treaty, which the U.S. Senate will soon begin discussing, is the one that will undergo a long series of amendments, of which 27 have already been announced.

Meanwhile, Escobar Bethancourt told newsmen that it was necessary to understand that the Panama Canal is part of the U.S. defense system and, for this reason, it was hard for the U.S. Senate to give up the canal to Panama. Escobar Bethancourt said that last night the Panamanian Government was facing a state of uncertainty and could not express any joy over something which still is incomplete.

He added that the last reservation to the neutrality treaty touches upon the Panamanian Government's main concern not to have the U.S. Government meddling in Panama's domestic, political or state affairs. Further, he said that nonetheless, our government is highly optimistic regarding the power of understanding of the two countries linked together by the canal.

Royo and Escobar Bethancourt said that the Panamanian Government's final position will be established when the Torrijos-Carter ratification instruments are exchanged and that Panama has only two options: to accept the ratified treaties as they stand or to consider that they violate the nature of the Torrijos-Carter treaties approved by the Panamanian people during a plebiscite on 23 October 1977. For this reason, the Panamanian Government is maintaining a cautious attitude and wise prudence, Escobar Bethancourt said, and is waiting for the final results of the U.S. Senate debates.

CRITICA ON TREATY AMENDMENTS, RESERVATIONS

While the nation analyzes the real meaning of the word "amendment—which changes the true nature of an article of the treaty and affects its essence, implying, according to some, the "rejection" of the document—and while the legal effects of the notorious "reservations"—which is a weaker term than "amendments" but stronger than "interpretations"—are considered, the local media researches, gathers information and evaluates the scope of the U.S. Senate sessions on the Torrijos-Carter treaties.

The fruitful meeting held yesterday afternoon with treaty negotiators Romulo Escobar Bethancourt and Aristides Royo was part of this search for information. The dialog revealed through details on the treaty negotiating sessions and the way in which the United States views certain articles of the treaty.

This is how we found out that despite the existence of Spanish and English versions of the documents, the characteristics of our different legal systems—the Anglo-Saxon and Latin systems—have led to interpretations being made from very particular viewpoints and this, together with the idiomatic concepts, produce adverse effects in each country every time the texts are analyzed.

The necessity of making serious and thorough studies without haste, concerning what has occurred so far and what is yet to be discussed, was clearly established after the exchange of opinions. We are aware of the lack of experience of President Carter concerning the ways in which the senators operate, even those of his own party. This inexperience has been the cornerstone of the obstacles to ratification, but it has been useful since it was his "virgin" spirit which led him to materialize the negotiations. This fact must be taken into consideration because if they are not ratified in this first [as published] year of the U.S. President's term, several decades would have to pass before another president would decide to follow in his footsteps or thousands of lives would have to be lost to end definitely the American colonialist presence in our country.

For now, the DeConcini amendment can be considered to be part of the "Torrijos-Carter understanding" although it was made in bad faith. The final conclusion about its scope will be given by us later. However, that was the general conclusion. We must be prepared to hear more amendments and, especially, dozens of additional reservations being proposed with greater diatribe against Panama and its rulers since thus far we have heard very few heirs of the intelligence of a Jefferson, a Lincoln or a Benjamin Franklin.

REACTION TO TREATY RATIFICATION GENERALLY MILD

Two minor demonstrations by extreme leftwing university students have been the only reaction on the part of the Panamanian people following yesterday's ratification of the first of the Panama Canal treaties which was voted on in the U.S. Senate. Aside from that, Panamanians received the news of the ratification of the neutrality pact with almost total indifference.

The Americans who live and work in the Canal Zone and had firmly opposed the new agreements also received the ratification of the neutrality pact with overwhelming apathy.

Last night, the extreme leftwing students staged a demonstration against the ratification on the campus of the University of Panama. The group of demonstrators was small, as was the demonstration staged this morning in front of the office building of the American Embassy.

Olimpo Saenz, leader of the Camilo Torres Circle, said that the important thing is not the number of participants but the essence of the protest movement against the canal treaties.

On campus last night and this morning at the U.S. Embassy, the demonstrators symbolically burned the new treaties. There was no violence reported during any of the events.

The Panamanian Government reacted by announcing that it will call a special general State Council meeting with Panamanian Ambassador Gabriel Lewis Galindo in attendance. The Panamanian Foreign Ministry revealed last night that the Council of State meeting will be held only after the U.S. Senate considers the second treaty, the one that actually refers to the Panama Canal.

One office worker explained the people's apathy toward the ratification by noting that we Panamanians feel that the conventions negotiated between the two countries do not fully meet Panamanian expectations, let alone doing so following the amendments and reservations made by the U.S. Senate.

STUDENT GROUP DENOUNCES TREATY CHANGES

Members of the University Anti-imperialist Front (FAU) yesterday picketed the U.S. Embassy to protest and denounce the efforts by U.S. senators to change the political conditions of Panama [condiciones politicas de Panama] in favor of their plans of oppression.

The group issued a communique pointing out that everything indicates that the U.S. Government is maneuvering with amendments, understandings and reservations in an effort to reverse the essential gains that the Torrijos-Carter treaties provide Panama.

Ambassador to U.S. Returns, Comments on Canal

Gabriel Lewis Galindo, Panamanian ambassador to the United States, and his legal adviser, Ricardo (Bilonic) Paredes, returned to Panama early this morning at the request of Chief of Government Gen. Omar Torrijos to participate in the very important meeting which General Torrijos will hold with his government team concerning the ratification of the neutrality treaty.

Ambassador Lewis, before leaving the United States and being besieged by television, press and other communications media representatives, said the following: Our government has declared radio silence because, in international politics, very often the best word is the one that is not spoken. General Torrijos and President Carter, before the television cameras and with the world as a witness, designed a suit of clothing which replaced the colonial cloak that covers 1,442 square km of our land. This cloak was created in 1903 by a Frenchman who claimed to represent Panama and by then U.S. Secretary of State Hay, a well-known colonialist and expansionist figure.

President Carter more closely approaches the sense of morality and dignity of his people than some government spokesmen. What Senator DeConcini added to the neutrality treaty and what he said during his speech yesterday has wounded the deepest feelings of almost 2 million Panamanians.

I pray to God that in the scale of values of our people, 32 [as heard] will be the number that will inspire us to continue fighting until we achieve our ideal. Panama is a small country, but it is a nation that is large in pride and dignity and it will never be a land of eunuchs. Latin America is awakening. We have all been humiliated 32 times over.

Costa Rican, Nicaraguan Presidents Comments on Ratification

Costa Rican President Daniel Oduber has stated that the ratification of the Panama Canal neutrality treaty by the U.S. Senate was a struggle of all America and that the United States has shown that it is possible to discuss any hemispheric problem on an equal footing.

(Question by unidentified interviewer—begin recordings.) Here with us is the president of the Republic of Costa Rica, Daniel Oduber Quiros, who will speak to us about the approval of the Panama Canal treaty today. [as heard] Don Daniel, what do you think about the approval of this treaty?

(Answer) Look, Marcia, it has been such a long struggle—as far as I can remember, at least 16 years—dating back to when I first assumed the office of foreign minister of Costa Rica. Since then we have waged what I would call a hemispheric struggle along with the Panamanian people and all its government representatives so Panama could recover its rights over the canal. I still do not know in depth the amendments that I have been told would be added to the treaty. However, if this whole set of concepts, this whole set of legal provisions, is acceptable to the Panamanian people, I would say that a struggle of all of America has been won and that the United States has been able to show the world that it is possible for a large and a small nation to negotiate on an equal footing on the American continent. The approval of the treaty has a profound meaning. In the few days that I have left in office. I will make this known to all the people, groups and countries whom I asked to be patient for many years in order to negotiate and draw up a treaty that marks the beginning of a new era for the Republic of Panama.

(Question) Don Daniel, what effects do you think the approval of this treaty will have on U.S. relations with the Latin American countries?

(Answer) The most important thing is that President Carter has demonstrated that an American president can believe in fraternal relations on an equal footing with the nations of the American continent. Many times as a government leader and politician throughout all the years that I have been engaged in these activities, I came to doubt the good faith of the U.S. Government leaders as far as their relationship with Latin America is concerned. However, in the specific case of President Carter, since he was elected I realized that Latin America meant something to him and during the times that I have talked to him and other officials of his administration, I have reached the conclusion that Latin America has a lot to expect from the United States under Jimmy Carter's rule. [end recording]

In the meantime, Nicaraguan President Gen Anastasio Somoza today came out in favor of the ratification of the neutrality pact in Washington yesterday. President Somoza said it was a step forward toward international equality.

(Question by another unidentified interviewer—begin recording.) What meaning does the ratification of the Torrijos-Carter canal treaties have for you and for the small and weak nations?

(Answer) Well, (aware) that there is international law, that we live according to treaties and that legal power has greater value than force, the world has come to recognize the interests of nations, whether large and powerful or small. I think this is a step toward international equality.

(Interviewer) that is right! (end recording)

Independent Lawyers Express Concern Over Treaty Amendments

The Independent Lawyers Movement today expressed what it termed deep concern over the approval of some amendments, understandings and reservations to the neutrality treaty, especially the approval of the reservation by Senators Dennis DeConcini and Sam Nunn, which they consider to be more harmful to the interests of Panama.

Workers Central Rejects Treaty Amendments, Reservations

(Article by Mario Martinez P.)

Several unions in Panama and the Canal Zone have expressed concern over the ratification of the neutrality treaty with the inclusion of certain amendments and reservations which curtail the gains achieved by the people of Panama.

At the same time, the National Central of Panamanian Workers (CNTP) recommended that "the unity of all forces which support the (revolutionary) process be strengthened around the great anti-imperialist front." In a statement to the media yesterday, the CNTP expressed "unrestricted support for Gen. Omar Torrijos and the reaffirmation of our revolutionary position." It urged its members and all progressive sectors of Panama "to seek international economic and technical support and to massively participate in the upcoming elections for popular power."

The CNTP issued a statement yesterday expressing "its most vigorous rejection of the U.S. Senate maneuvers which curtail essential gains of the Panamanian nation." According to the statement, the labor organization, one of Panama's largest, rejected the so-called amendments, reservations and understandings of the neutrality treaty.

The document, which was signed by the plenum of the CNTP executive secretariat, made certain recommendations to its members and asked them to "close ranks" in view of the present situation. It also encouraged its members to demand that the U.S. Government faithfully comply with the treaties approved by the Panamanians. It made clear that it is necessary to avoid desperation and "imperialist" provocations. Similarly, it requested support for Gen. Omar Torrijos and the process he heads.

Regarding the position to be followed by CNTP members, it called for "the rejection of any attempt by the U.S. Government to perpetuate the presence of its soldiers in our territory."

The reaction of the different labor organizations is in regard to certain last minute amendments or reservations to the neutrality treaty ratified by U.S. senators on Thursday. According to the Panamanians, the amendments or reservations curtail in practice the hopes for national liberation to recover the territory described as the Canal Zone. The CNTP statement notes that the amendments and reservations to the neutrality treaty "are for imposing conditions on our people and government with the preconceived purpose of perpetuating the presence of murderous troops in the canal strip, the colonial and neocolonial enclave and everything that goes with it.

Torrijos, Aides Studying U.S. Senate's Treaty Amendments

(Article by Luis Castilla Bravo)

Without making any sort of public statement in reply to the U.S. Senate, Panamanian Chief of Government Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera and his chief aides have been meeting in permanent session since Friday to assess the extent of the well-known Senate amendments, particularly the DeConcini amendment (as published), and the reservations established by the U.S. Senate to the treaty on neutrality signed by the United States and Panama.

As may be recalled, Panama approved a "package" of two documents that make up the treaties on the Panama Canal. Both were intimately linked and therefore subject to a single condition: the disappearance on 31 December 1999 of the last Yankee boot from our national territory.

These documents, submitted to the Senate's scrutiny after being signed by President Carter, underwent minute and thorough consideration by that august chamber but did so in reverse, that is, instead of first analyzing the document that indicates the end of the Hay-Bunau Varilla Treaty and sets a date for the end of U.S. presence on that part of the territory, the Senate ratified the second part, which is practically military in nature.

General Torrijos indicated on the same day the Senate was voting that under no circumstance would he accept amendments that injure national dignity. On his part, Carter has said that these amendments do not affect the spirit of the treaty, but the senators have already begun to express serious concern since, in the opinion of some of them, the treaty has been violated.

Although the national and foreign press has attempted to penetrate into the residence on 50th Street owned by the chief of government's economic adviser, where the permanent sessions are taking place, all efforts have been futile.

It has been learned behind the scenes that General Torrijos, in addition to consulting with his main advisory team, is also consulting the main leaders of the world before giving an official reply. On the other hand, in yesterday's session, the Senate began to show concern regarding Panama's reaction since up to now there has only been quiet, and quiet generally comes before the storm.

Robert P. Griffin, for example, one of the treaties main opponents, said yesterday that he could not understand how the senators could vote in favor of one of the treaties and against the other. "As I see it," he pointed out, "the two of them constitute a whole."

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS DISCUSS TREATY RATIFICATION PROCESS

(From "La Llorona" column)

Aristides Royo, Adolfo Ahumada, Perez Valladares, Rory Gonzalez, Ambassador Lewis Galindo and Foreign Minister Gonzales Revilla make up the group of ranking state officials headed by Vice President Gerardo Gonzales who left Paitilla Airport yesterday for Parallon, presumably to discuss the course taken by the treaty ratification process in the U.S. Senate.

COLUMNIST CALLS FOR UNITY IN FACE OF TREATY CHANGES

("Conciencia Publica" column by Miguel Angel Moreno Gongora: "Unity and Sorrow of the Fatherland")

The voting on the neutrality treaty and the reservations, understandings and amendments adopted show how wrong were those who once thought that President Carter's political ability and the Senate's respect for him were in direct proportion to his self-esteem and Christian good faith toward Panama. Circumstances turned out to be against him. In the eyes of U.S., Panamanian and world public opinion, his personal prestige and political stature have been dealt a serious blow. They have been very seriously wounded.

President Carter has to be either naive, very blind or very insincere not to realize that the final result of what occurred in the Senate at 1630 on 16 March does not represent the Panamanian people's aspirations and is not in keeping with the promises he made to the world that justice would prevail for Panama.

In view of the imminence of an adverse vote and seeing himself weak and incapable of fulfilling his promises and predictions regarding the voting, the U.S. President had to make concessions to senators in one group or the other. In the end, these concessions resulted in a treaty patched, scratched out and rough drafted against Panamanian interests because it grants the United States the right to reserve for itself the interpretation and acceptance or rejection of situations that will be humiliating for Panama because they distort the objectives of the treaty, confirm and reaffirm perpetuity, make acceptable the right to intervene in our domestic affairs and prevent us from fully exercising our sovereignty even after we physically recover the canal, as we will demonstrate shortly.

The Panamanians' votes for the treaties were aimed at responding affirmatively to a question concerning the text of the documents that were later submitted to the Senate. That was the will of the majority, that was the watchword and that was what our sovereign people consented to. We may or may not have agreed with the treaties, but as Panamanians and in the face of the accomplished fact, the only thing left for us to do was to wish that the voting would favor the bright destiny of our national greatness. Nonetheless, this was not the case because in a new demonstration of secular imperialism the senators of both parties adulterated the contents of the treaty, making it unacceptable to every good Panamanian. From the standpoint of international law, our public laws and honest diplomacy, this simply and clearly means that the treaty has been virtually rejected because it definitely is not what we Panamanians voted for.

The amendments, reservations, understandings and interpretations—terms under which the adulterations that the senators included in the treaty are euphemistically masked—automatically lead to its rejection because they render ineffective the will of the Panamanian people as set forth in the October plebiscite.

Now that the text of the treaty has been changed, we must begin a new stage of negotiations. The results of these negotiations must later be subjected to a new plebiscite in accordance with the constitution, which establishes that any treaty regarding the canal, its adjacent zones, the canal's protection, or the construction of a new sea-level canal or a third set of locks will be subjected to a national plebiscite.

We must face this new stage in our national suffering with unity and patriotism and with serenity and prudence. In particular the government leaders must avoid all prejudices, malice or reservation toward those that oppose it, because those opponents are above all Panamanians as patriotic as they are. They feel the fatherland's sorrows with the same intensity.

CLOSE ANALYSIS OF TREATY MODIFICATIONS URGED

(Editorial: "The U.S. Senate and the Neutrality Treaty")

The U.S. Senate yesterday took a stand regarding the "Treaty for the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal" in ways and in terms which have already been disseminated by the various media and which we have covered in our reporting section. We now have to wait for the debate on the "Panama Canal Treaty"—announced for the immediate future—to start. We also have to wait for the U.S. Senate to reach a decision on it. Consequently, considering that the two treaties will become effective simultaneously, one should feel that it is too soon to express definite judgments and opinions on what was agreed upon in Washington yesterday, which is only a part—although a substantial part—of the matter that is covered as a whole by the two aforementioned treaties.

In spite of everything and even though, we repeat, it would be wiser to wait for a final U.S. Senate decision, differing opinions, both for and against, will be made known regarding yesterday's decision. Naturally, the opinions expressed will be varied and probably of a discordant nature.

One of the first questions to ask ourselves would be to what extent and how the reservations, modifications, additions—or whatever they are called—introduced by the U.S. Senate will alter the scope, meaning or goal of the dispositions established in the articles of the original texts, which were signed by President Carter and General Torrijos and ratified by an overwhelming majority of Panamanians in a plebiscite held for that purpose. It is necessary to read and analyze with care, attentiveness and a great deal of calmness the so-called modifications before reaching a definite opinion on the matter. If after such an analysis one should consider them as unimportant, secondary and having no affect on the essence of what had been previously agreed upon and signed, then there should be no objection to accepting them, thereby avoiding a situation in which the treaties—which were so laboriously negotiated—will not be put into effect. At any rate, what is most advisable now is to keep an alert and vigilant attitude until complete Senate ratification is achieved after the "Panama Canal Treaty" is voted on.

POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF CARTER'S LETTER TO TORRIJOS EXAMINED

("Bona Fide" column by Camilo O. Perez: "The President's Serious Problem")

We have been weighing the contents of the letter that President Carter sent from Washington to the Panamanian chief of government immediately following the executive's acceptance of the DeConcini reservation. The letter states that Panamanians should not be worried about the "reservations" or amendments."

President Carter's statement seems to be opposed to the will of the Senate and at the same time a contradiction of the U.S. legal system. The effect of Carter's statement can be seen in the light of two possibilities:

1. It is an imprudent and naive maneuver. However, it is made in good faith befitting a man devoid of puritanical philosophical ideas. In this respect, Carter is a good Baptist.

2. It is a reply which seeks only one thing: to placate the various Panamanian sectors who do not see eye to eye with the amendments, reservations and understandings.

Besides, there is a danger that might directly affect the U.S. Senate's acceptance of the Panama Canal treaty. When the undecided senators realize that none of the amendments or reservations already approved in the neutrality treaty will meet with the President's approval, according to the letter we are commenting on, President Carter better be prepared for the second round of debates on the treaty that will return the Canal Zone to Panama.

We are more than sure that the senators will intensify their strategy on the Senate floor, and that, aware of the President's position, they will not believe in other agreements [as published] and will propose amendments and reservations which will be even more harmful and frustrating to Panama.

This means that President Carter and his Senate aides will have to struggle harder to avoid the defeat of a strategy as complicated as the one they carried out recently.

When statements are made, however, we must consider the way they will be interpreted domestically, as well as abroad.

A calm study must be made so as to establish a sort of security cordon. [as published] The same thing happens here. There are serious sectors that believe that the reservations and amendments are a change in the text of the treaty. They are not mistaken. Therefore, the senators who will propose amendments and reservations will be rejecting the treaties and will work toward that end.

FEP ISSUES COMMUNIQUE REJECTING SENATE'S TREATY CHANGES

(Communique issued by the Federation of Panamanian Students at special session held at the University of Panama on 21 March 1978)

"For organized vigilance by the people to defend the dignity of the fatherland":

1. Through the information media, the country has received with surprise the postponement until 17 April of the opening of classes for elementary and high schools and subsequently for the university. The same surprise was felt by the national leadership of the Federation of Panamanian Students (FEP), which was never consulted about the measure. The published report states that there was a request from the Board of Directors of the National Federation of Parents Associations employing the "argument" that Holy Week was at hand and that there are material problems involved in the opening of classes.

2. However, this postponement occurs in the context of the discussions of the Torrijos-Carter treaties, which are currently the subject of debate by the U.S. Senate. Unofficially, it is being maintained that the measure was designed to forestall possible provocations on the part of antipatriotic forces within the student movement. Although we concede that such a possibility exists, such a position reflects a great lack of confidence in and an underestimation of the maturity of the Panamanian student movement and of the masses in general.

3. For this reason, the FEP, based on its historic principles and on its revolutionary authority derived from the sacrifices of its militants and its martyrs, in response to the DeConcini reservation and the possible amendments that may be made to the Torrijos-Carter treaty, declares its firmest and most militant support for the position based on principles and national dignity that was outlined by Commander Torrijos in his letter to Carter on 15 March: "Panama will consider unacceptable any reservation which sullies the national dignity, which distorts or changes the objectives of the treaty or which seeks to prevent the exercise of sovereignty by Panama over all its territory, the turnover of the canal and the military withdrawal on 31 December 1999."

4. It is obvious that the imperialists, taking advantage of the failings of the process and depending on their unquestioning supporters in Panama, seek by means of the amendments and reservations to halt and destroy the process of national liberation which is being led by the military. Consequently, although it is true that the FEP realizes that the popular movement and Panamanian patriots in particular must exercise great patience, it is no less true that this calm should not be interpreted as passivity or as a sign of weakness or desperation. In this lies the hope of the enemy who wishes to isolate Commander Torrijos from his people and promote wavering within the forces committed to the struggle for national liberation, as well as to exclude the masses, its only guarantors, from this patriotic struggle.

5. Despite all the pressure, blackmail, provocations and attempts to anesthetize the patriotic conscience of our people, the popular movement has received with indignation and without cowardice the "reservations" approved by the U.S. Senate, which have only caused concern among those who trusted in the kindness of the imperialists, those who placed their own interests above the sacred interests of the fatherland and those who never believed that we were involved in a real struggle for national liberation and who did not realize that if there is no ratification, our people, fearing nothing, will take the path imposed by the circumstances in order to achieve their full independence—even taking up arms if necessary.

6. Therefore, we oppose the method used to decide on the postponement of classes because it introduces mistrust and suspicion about the fate of the treaties.

7. In addition, we demand the publication, as soon as possible, of the amendments and reservations attached to the neutrality pact by the U.S. Senate and [an explanation of] the extent of these amendments and reservations.

8. Moreover, in order that our people not be left out of this patriotic struggle, we demand the inclusion of all the active forces of the country into the process of determining and preparing the alternative actions to be taken as a result of the demands of the U.S. imperialists.

On our feet or dead, but never on our knees.

The FEP is on the march; nothing and no one can stop it.

(Signed) Federal Executive Council of the FEP.

Foreign Ministry Releases Text of Canal Treaty Changes

(Text of Panamanian Foreign Ministry communique dated 27 March 1978)

In our communique of 16 March we expressed the government's decision not to make any pronouncement on the Senate's resolutions concerning the treaty on the permanent neutrality of the canal and the operation of the Panama Canal. We said our reason for this was that the Panamanian people had approved two treaties, that is, the one referring to neutrality and the treaty on the Panama Canal, and until the Senate decides on the latter treaty is will not have given an answer to the decolonization program approved by the Panamanian people.

We also said in that communique that the government as whole would analyze the conditions under which the Senate gave its advice and consent to the neutrality treaty and the conditions it would express when pronouncing itself on the Panama Canal treaty. We have undertaken this process. But since the national liberation process is a national commitment which requires that each citizen be totally aware of the Senate understanding on the treaties, the Foreign Ministry has deemed it advisable to publish the text of the Senate resolution on the neutrality treaty without waiting for its official text to be delivered to us through the regular channels.

We are experiencing a crucial moment in our history. Now more than ever, the fatherland demands of its children calm, dignity and a sense of national unity.

Panama views its future with the calm of a nation that is enveloped in an irreversible national process of decolonization.

Let us recall that only peace-loving peoples can be free. Panama has decided on its definitive liberation. We are accompanied in this process by the peoples of the entire world, as we evidenced at the Security Council meeting held in March 1973 in Panama. There the world, in view of the veto of the U.S. delegates, vetoed [veto] the United States for not resolving the causes of conflict produced by the presence of a foreign government on Panamanian territory.

We recommend that our fellow citizens objectively study the documents which are being published today in Spanish and English so that they can assist the government in adopting the most patriotic decision which, as Panamanian Chief of Government Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera has said, will be within the framework of a vast national consensus.

Foreign Ministry.

Negotiator, Ambassador Leave for Washington

Education Minister Aristides Royo left yesterday for Washington together with Panamanian Ambassador to the United Gabriel Lewis Galindo. No official source has disclosed the reasons for the departure of minister and negotiator Royo for Washington, but it is believed that his trip is related to the Senate debate on the Panama Canal treaty. It was also not disclosed if Dr. Royo is carrying any special message from the Panamanian Government to U.S. authorities.

Bayano Sees Treaty Amendments as Deliberate Provocation

BAYANO, an organ at the service of Panamanian workers, has stated in its editorial that the incorporation or reservations, understandings and amendments into the treaty on the neutrality of the canal and the functioning of the waterway is a political maneuver designed to produce an unsettled situation within Panamanian society.

The newspaper, which is published biweekly, later states that by means of the attitude adopted by the U.S. Senate, the Carter administration is skirting its historic responsibility by transferring the problem to the national government, particularly to its top leader, General Torrijos.

In his letter to the U.S. President on 15 March, our chief of government said that no amendment or reservation that harms the truly just aspirations of the Panamanian people will be accepted. The biweekly BAYANO emphasizes that U.S. Government circles have directed the first amendment and reservations toward the issue that is most sensitive where the Panamanian nation is concerned—the nation's right to the sovereign and independent exercise of effective neutrality, with intervention or foreign military aggression—in other words, to make the Panamanian liberating process react to the provocation.

The BAYANO editorial emphasizes the people's devotion to peace and to the construction of a future without the wounds of a bloody struggle for liberation. However, in the face of an attempt to keep the aggressive imperialist boot on their soil eternally, our people will be prepared to take action, whatever the consequences, in order to achieve total independence, BAYANO says in closing.

Columnist Equates Senate Canal Treaty Changes With Rejection

("Bona Fide" column by Camilo O. Perez: "Amendments to Amendments and so on Until the End of Time.")

We have read in the front page of yesterday's issue of La Estrella de Panama a paid advertisement consisting of a translation of a quotation from Time magazine's latest issue. It deals with President Carter's change of attitude in the face of pressures from some senators, including Mr. DeConcini.

In spite of the commitment between President Carter and General Torrijos regarding a "certain pledged word," the powerful U.S. political and monopolistic forces have prevailed over this "pledged word."

Our position in this connection is characterized by calm study and a cautious wait-and-see attitude. This is so because, as we have repeatedly said, this is a problem of U.S. politicians and not of Panamanians. However, we would not be surprised if things changed in the future and Washington decided to pass on to Panama the responsibility for rejection.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, we feel that the first treaty has already been rejected by the U.S. Senate. Thus, the waiting in regard to the other treaty, that is, the treaty concerning the Panama Canal, involves only a matter of procedure to formalize the rejection.

Mr. Carter faces a serious political problem that will lead to decisions which will for the first time bring to the surface the crisis which has existed for decades in the relationship between Congress and the Executive branch.

Furthermore, once the treaties and the declarations containing the reservations and amendments are returned, we Panamanians will face the possibility mentioned above, which time has mentioned in order to attack Carter.

We have begun a study of history and found that there is a particular precedent justifying what the Senate is now doing. In other words, when the Thompson-Urrutia treaty was negotiated, the U.S. Senate returned it with certain amendments after discussing it, feeling that it had approved the treaty in that manner. It was then that the Colombian Government, in view of that fact, returned the treaty to the U.S. Government with its own observations and amendments to the proposed amendments. This forced the Senate to discuss the matter again. The rest is history.

In this case, after the treaties reach Panama with all of the detailed observations, we will have to analyze the cited precedent in order to keep the responsibility for crisis from being passed on to the Panamanian people.

This is so because if violence arises as the only possible argument to achieve our patriotic demands, let the first shot be fired there and not here. That is the way the Vietnamese acted.

Commentator Expects Public Debate on Treaty Changes

("Analysis of the News" commentary by Mario Velasquez)

Following the holy week break, which the Panamanians take advantage of to escape from reality a little, by vacationing in the country's interior and participation in religious celebrations, the country returns to normalcy and to its daily cares.

We notice with satsifaction that the week begins with the official public announcement by the Foreign Ministry of the amendments, reservations, and understandings which the U.S. Senate introduced to the resolution of ratification of the Treaty on the Permanent Neutrality of the Canal and the Operation of the Panama Canal.

The public announcement of these important documents is accompanied by a Foreign Ministry communique which reiterates the government stand announced in its previous communique of 16 March to the effect that it will not make any pronouncement on what the Senate had agreed to in relation to the neutrality treaty until the Senate has decided on the Panama Canal treaty, on which it will probably vote in late April.

I feel that both Foreign Ministry communiques—the one dated 16 March and the one of this morning—display a clear sense of responsibility in handling a very delicate issue. It is a sensible and patriotic thing for the government to make a very serious evaluation and a thorough study of these amendments, reservations and understandings prior to taking a decision which, due to the nature and dimension of the problem, will be a most important one. Likewise, the public announcement of these documents and the recommendations included in the last paragraph of the communique published this morning, which asked the Panamanians to study the documents published in order to help the government make the most patriotic decision, is an invitation to a public debate on these amendments, reservations and debates. This is the only possible means by which the community will be able to discuss the scope of these amendments and make public its opinion, and in this manner the government will have sufficient data to permit it to make a decision within the framework of a great national consensus, as this morning's Foreign Ministry communique said:

Actually, the Foreign Ministry communique which we are commenting on is in the spirit of the letter which Gen. Omar Torrijos sent President Carter on 15 March. In fact, in this letter Torrijos told the U.S. President that the Panamanian Government will begin the careful study of these reservations and will announce its position once the Senate has completed the voting on both treaties. Then, in a strong worded paragraph which is a reiteration of a political decision and which really voices the unanimous feeling of the Panamanians, Torrijos told Carter that such a study will be based on the following concepts: Panama will not accept any reservation which offends national dignity, which distorts or changes the objectives of the treaty or which is aimed at impeding the effective exercise of the sovereignty of Panama over all of its territory, the turnover of the canal, and the end of military occupation on 31 December 1999. Torrijos then added in the same letter sent to President Carter that the Panamanian people will not accept any words, misplaced commas, or ambiguous phrases which are aimed at or mean an occupation in perpetuity disguised as neutrality or an intervention in Panama's domestic affairs.

It seems very clear that these paragraphs we have quoted define the national position shared by all conscientious Panamanians. In the light of these concepts Torrijos is transmitting to Carter the manner in which the amendments, reservations and understanding which the Senate will add to the two Panama Canal treaties will be studied. In other words, Torrijos has established parameters, points of reference for the studies to be made of the amendments. This is not a matter of legal speculation or intellectual loopholes, but very clear and precise terms of consideration which pertain to our national dignity and sovereignty. The serious part, the obscure part of this issue is found in the U.S. counterpart, where a series of situations and interests, visible and complex, are having a negative influence on the handling of the problem of the ratification of the treaties.

If there is any doubt in this respect, the Panamanians should at this stage of our relations with the United States be convinced that U.S. national interests prevail in these relations and that there has never been anything which we could call generosity or altruism in Washington's policy toward our country.

As for the senators, a large majority of them are immersed in the political problems of their states, in their reelection possibilities, and concerned solely about what they call the national security interests of the United States. We witnessed the 7-hour U.S. Senate debate on Thursday, 16 March, when the neutrality treaty was approved. Together with Luz Maria Noli [Televisora Nacional reporter], we were the only Panamanians inside the U.S. Senate during those dramatic hours. We lived that historical moment and were not able to notice at any time any moment of grandeur or a sense of history on the part of the dozens of speakers who came up, one after another, to reiterate their concern over the military, economic, and political interests of the empire, totally removed from and indifferent to the interests of a small republic which has lived for 75 years tied down to the fate of the U.S. nation.

Nothing reflects the spirit of the Senate better than the conversation between President Jimmy Carter and Republican Senator Edward Brooke, when the only black senator told Carter that he was creating a sort of Frankenstein by not permitting changes. Carter told him that he had given his word to Torrijos and he could not back down. Senator Brooke then answered him: Look, that is the Panamanians' problem; that is not our problem. The report on this conversation is carried in today's issue of the Time magazine, dated 27 March. The report adds that the Senate leaders then convinced President Carter to back down, and subsequently negotiations began with Nunn, Talmadge, DeConcini and other senators who insisted on amendments.

And this concludes our analysis for today. Tomorrow, we will continue with more on the same subject.

CRITICA SEES NEED FOR PLEBISCITE ON AMENDMENTS

(Editorial: "Foreign Ministry Communique")

The Foreign Ministry yesterday released a press communique which was widely disseminated by all the information media in the country. The Foreign Ministry began by recalling that on 16 March it had said that the "revolutionary government had decided not to make any pronouncement on the Senate's resolutions in relation to the treaties on the 'Permanent Neutrality of the Canal and the Operation of the Panama Canal.'"

As was clearly stated on that occasion, the revolutionary government decided to abstain for now from giving an opinion on the Senate decision. The reason was obvious: The Panamanian people by constitutional mandate in the 23 October plebiscite gave their approval, without reservations or amendments, to the two treaties that were signed on 7 October 1977 in Washington before the chiefs of state of the continent in the OAS Room of the Americas, the so-called Torrijos-Carter treaties which form, under their signature, a single legal entity.

However, the U.S. Senate recently began debating the canal treaty, which is the more important for Panama, without lessening the importance of the neutrality treaty. Therefore, the Foreign Ministry affirmed that the national liberation process is a national commitment, which is why it decided to publicize the Senate resolution so that all the changes made to the neutrality treaty may be studied by all the people in order to achieve the broadest patriotic consensus of national opinion before making a decision on a matter of such vital interest.

We want to be totally clear regarding the reservations, understandings and amendments to the treaty which have passed the great test before the U.S. Senate. In light of the constitutional provisions which authorized the plebiscite for approving or disapproving the Torrijos-Carter treaties, we consider that any addenda [aumentos] to those treaties made by the U.S. Senate will have to be submitted to a plebiscite in Panama.

Some of those amendments are acceptable, such as that agreed upon between President Carter and General Torrijos before the plebiscite was held. But there is one which, because it affects the sole responsibility of Panama in the canal's operation after the year 2000, cannot be accepted, primarily because it would permit U.S. armed intervention in the event of a canal stoppage, which is something that has happened more than once to its actual "owners."

We will try to study these amendments in order to pinpoint their lack of reasoning. Meanwhile, the revolutionary government can also prepare its reply, duly approved by the people, in case President Carter cannot manage to eliminate the humiliating and intolerable aspects of these amendments.

RADIO MIA FORECASTS NEW TREATY PLEBISCITE

(Unattributed commentary)

The Foreign Ministry communique did not reveal the official position of the Panamanian Government. The ministry merely issued a document to enlighten the nation on the amendments, reservations and changes made by the U.S. senators.

We do not know, however, what the position of the Panamanian Government, of General Torrijos or of the foreign minister is. In fact, they have turned the problem over to us that we might express our opinion as Panamanians.

Mario Velasquez' statements, however, have made us wonder, because he would appear to imply, as far as I can see, that President Carter was able to obtain the ratification of the first treaty by modifying his position concerning his promise to General Torrijos and allowing the amendments to be included. If Carter had not negotiated with DeConcini and the others, the treaty would probably not have been ratified.

The above leads us to believe that the treaty has not been altogether satisfactory to the chief of government's original position. Yesterday, for example, we approached Dr. Cesar Quintero while visiting the Finance Ministry and asked him about the matter. Quintero told us that the situation was one which demanded that every Panamanian express an opinion on the treaty and that he is considering initiating a serious analysis of the significance and effects of the amendments.

Taking all the above into consideration, we venture to advance the following journalistic predictions; first, that we will have to hold another plebiscite. Neither the government nor General Torrijos is going to assure sole responsibility for accepting a treaty with amendments which constitute changes.

Amendment means correction. Reservation, as far as we have been able to determine, means that the U.S. Government includes some considerations to the treaty which are attached to it and, once it is delivered to Panama with said reservations, if Panama fails to respond to them within a specific period of time as established by international law, then the reservations become part of the treaty, tacitly accepted through Panama's silence.

Consequently, we believe the government is again considering passing on the responsibility to the people. We do not believe that General Torrijos is considering accepting the treaty, as many claim. Thus, it is quite probable that we will have to hold another plebiscite on the ratified documents. We have come to this conclusion in view of the official silence, since nobody knows what the position of the government in this respect is.

Second, after the statements made last night by Mario Velasquez, who has all along been close to General Torrijos and who has usually followed the line of the government, we have concluded that the treaty was ratified because Carter failed to fulfill his promise to General Torrijos, and we believe that in view of this failure, the chief of government will not accept full responsibility.

And third, we believe that a meeting of General Torrijos with President Carter in Venezuela, with Carlos Andres Perez as mediator, is imminent. This meeting could be official or unofficial. As you know, our chief of government could get in his plane here, take off, and suddenly appear in Venezuela, even without the knowledge of President Perez. However, they will meet and talk, for such is the modern diplomacy introduced by General Torrijos, which has been criticized by some sectors because it dispenses with diplomatic coordination. Nevertheless, whether good or bad, such is the way General Torrijos has handled things in the country, and in doing so he has placed the problem of Panama on an international level.

We repeat, the three scoops we have for you today, the products of our journalistic deductions, are: first, that the government is not pleased with the ratified treaty; second, it is being implied, according to my understanding, that President Carter had to yield ground in his promise to General Torrijos, which will be sufficient reason for the treaties to be subjected to a new plebiscite; and third, a meeting between President Carter and General Torrijos during Carter's visit to Venezuela—or perhaps before—is imminent. Such are our scoops for today.

FOREIGN MINISTRY COMMUNIQUE ON TREATY CHANGES PRAISED

(The "Los Hombres y Los Hechos" column)

The communique issued recently by the Foreign Ministry under Nicolas Gonzalez Revilla's leadership revealing the amendments and reservations attached to the neutrality treaty by the Senate is very timely and patriotic. This has helped to determine the national consensus sought by the government.

It has been disclosed that one of the main points in the agenda Carlos Andres Perez has set up for President Carter's visit to Caracas is a review of the situation regarding the Panama Canal treaties. This is most important bcause it is another sign of Latin American solidarity with our country.

MATUTINO URGES RESISTANCE TO TREATY CHANGES

(From the "Bitacora de la Redaccion" column)

The amendments and reservations attached to the neutrality treaty and those which may be attached to the Panama Canal treaty will be discussed within the context of an extensive national consensus. The decision taken in this respect places in the hands of the people, of all Panamanians, the historic responsibility that must be borne. The measure is a wise one and in line with the October revolution's philosophy of dialog and consultation.

Let those who have denied us the patriotic right to end the causes of conflict stemming from the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty examine carefully the pronouncements to be made from now on.

It is our belief that our country has honestly lived up to its part in the negotiations which resulted in the Torrijos-Carter treaties.

And our leaders, like the people who ratified those legal instruments in a democratic plebiscite, recognized the many failings of the treaties and stated for the historical record that we remained "under the umbrella of the Pentagon."

But from that to having to accept the whims and power struggle of a group of senators who seek to wound Panamanians and their leaders with insults and humiliate us with amendments and reservations without name is something else.

Panama and its leaders cannot be called intransigent. But we should be intransigent in face of a situation which does not settle the causes of conflict but which, on the contrary, multiplies them in an offensive way.

In the meantime, it is up to the citizens to form an opinion, to evaluate the documents and measure the consequences and sacrifices and decide if we must continue struggling for the irreversibility of the process of decolonizing our fatherland.

At this time the Panamanian chief of government, Gen. Omar Torrijos, should be aware that he has never been alone and will never be alone in the struggle which he has led honestly.

TV COMMENTATOR ANALYZES DECONCINI, NUNN RESERVATIONS

Of the group of reservations, understandings and amendments approved by the U.S. Senate, there are two which cause the most concern. They are the reservations presented by Democratic Senators Sam Nunn and Dennis DeConcini. Nunn's reservation states that nothing in the treaty shall preclude Panama and the United States from making, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, any agreement or arrangement between the two countries to facilitate at any time after 31 December 1999 the fulfillment of their responsibilities to maintain the regime of neutrality established in the treaty, including agreements or arrangements for the stationing of any U.S. military forces or the maintenance of U.S. defense sites in the Republic of Panama after that date that Panama and the United States may consider necessary or appropriate.

In fact, what this reservation intends is to leave open the possibility to negotiate for the maintenance of U.S. armed forces in Panama after 31 December 1999, the date after which, according to the canal treaty, there will be no foreign troops in our country. Although a reservation of this nature has the strength of the fact that one of the signers is the foremost military power of the world, which today has militiary bases in our country and inexhaustible resources to force negotiations this amendment, in its specific wording, in any case leaves open the alternative of negotiations between the two parties, Panama could or could not negotiate, reach an agreement or not reach an agreement on the maintenance of U.S. defense sites in our country after the year 2000. This is a power or prerogative which it would have anyway, whether Senator Sam Nunn's reservation existed or not.

However, it would seem very premature to include in the neutrality treaty a clause to negotiate for an eventuality which could occur in any case within 23 years.

The other worrisome reservation is the one submitted by Senator Dennis DeConcini, Democrat from Arizona. This reservation states textually: Notwithstanding the provisions of Article V or any other provision of the treaty, if the canal is closed or its operation, are interfered with, the Republic of Panama and the United States shall each independently have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary, including the use of military force in Panama, to reopen the canal or restore the operations of the canal, as the case may be.

This reservation, approved by the Senate with the consent of President Carter, constitutes the real crux of the problem. Its text is fairly clear, and the conclusion is simple: This amendment establishes the unilateral U.S. right to intervene in Panama with military force to reopen the canal and reestablish its operation, as the case may be.

Some might think that Senator DeConcini's reservation is a kind of expansion, with different wording, of the principles contained in the Torrijos-Carter joint declaration of 14 October, which refers to the responsibility which the United States and Panama have to insure that the canal will remain secure and open to the ships of all nations, which says that each of the two countries, according to their respective constitutional processes, will defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality and consequently shall have the right to act in case of aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of ships through the canal.

However, this declaration of understanding incorporated as an amendment to the treaty ends by saying that it does not mean and will not be interpreted as the rights to U.S. intervention in the internal affairs of Panama. Any action on the part of the United States will be directed toward insuring that the canal will remain open, secure and accessible and that it will never be directed against the territorial integrity and political independence of Panama.

Let us now see what Senator Dennis DeConcini says about his reservation approved by the Senate. We have already read the text of the reservation, and the local press has published it. If that reservation worries us after reading it, let us now see what Senator DeConcini said in the U.S. Senate on the afternoon of 16 March when he explained the scope of his reservation: The purpose of this reservation, Mr. President, is very simple. It is designed to establish a precondition for the acceptance of the neutrality treaty by the United States. This precondition establishes that, disregarding any reason and in spite of any other measure which the neutrality treaty may establish or to whatever other interpretation it may be subjected, if the Panama Canal is closed, the United States has the right to enter Panama by any means that may be necessary to reopen the canal.

Senator DeConcini added: There are no conditions, no exceptions or limitations to this right. By the terms of this amendment the United States will decide when that necessity exists and will exercise its own judgment about the means necessary to insure that the canal will remain open and accessible.

Many of the discussions with respect to the Panama Canal treaty, added DeConcini, have centered on threats which might come from third parties, specifically from communist countries. While this concern is certainly justified, I have been equally concerned over the possibility that internal Panamanian activities could also become a threat to the waterway. Labor strikes, the actions of an unfriendly government, disorders and political uprisings, each one, separately or jointly, could cause the closing of the canal. As I read the treaties, there is no specific guarantee that any stoppage of the canal arising from the internal activities of the Panamanian may be rapidly and adequately handled.

DeConcini goes on to say: Although General Torrijos has brought a substantial degree of stability to Panama in these recent years, it can be argued that Panama's history is one of instability and political unrest. Senator DeConcini goes on to say that under normal circumstances the United States should not contemplate interfering in the internal affairs of another nation. However, there exist unique and special circumstances surrounding the relations between the United States and Panama. Since the turn of this century, the United States has exercised de facto sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone. We have maintained this control over the canal for a simple reason. The Panama Canal is vital to the security, economy and armed forces of the United States.

This fact, DeConcini says, must be recognized in any treaty contemplating fundamental changes in U.S.-Panamanian relations. The amendment contains a very specific reference to the use of military force in Panama. I believe, DeConcini says, that these words are absolutely crucial because they establish the right—which I am not convinced is adequately contemplated in the body of the treaties or in the leadership amendments—of the United States to take military action if warranted by the circumstances. Furthermore, DeConcini says, this amendment makes it very clear that the United States can take military action in Panamanian territory without the consent of the Panamanian Government.

The Arizona senator then goes on to say: This issue of consent is also crucial because this amendment is directed primarily at situations in which the canal is closed due to internal trouble in Panama, such as strikes, political uprisings or other similar events, in which case Panamanian permission to take military action would be meaningless.

He then adds: If the United States must have a right under this treaty, that right must be to act independently to protect and keep the canal open.

Concluding, Senator Dennis DeConcini adds the following in one of his closing paragraphs: I hope the Senate will support this amendment I am submitting to the resolution of ratification granting the United States the right to keep the canal open. I am also pleased to announce that the U.S. President has supported this change and has indicated that it will be a constructive step toward achieving the goals of the neutrality treaty.

I feel this supporting speech delivered by Senator DeConcini will be a very important factor when the time comes to evaluate the nature and the scope of the reservation he submitted and which the U.S. Senate incorporated into the resolution of ratification. This closes our analysis for today.

Tomorrow, dear listeners, we will continue with our comments on and analysis of this topic, which is so important and exciting topic to Panamanians.

Camilo Torres Circle Member Criticizes Treaty Changes

(Statement by Olimpo Saenz, member of the Camilo Torres Circle, on the 27 March Foreign Ministry communique on the U.S. Senate resolution to the Panama Canal neutrality treaty, during the "Canonero de Domplin" program—live)

The nation, the Panamanians of today and tomorrow, can never accept, under any circumstances, these amendments, which are extremely humilitating to the nation and to every Panamanian. Neither can they accept the reservations and understandings, for similar reasons.

The treaty submitted to the consideration of the Panamanian people in the 23 October plebiscite did not include these reservations, understandings, or amendments. Since a treaty is a document between two nations and since the United States added reservations and amendments and the Panamanians approved a treaty in a plebiscite that did not include these reservations and amendments, then the Panamanian people must express its position concerning these amendments, reservations and understandings.

According to the U.S. Constitution, it is the Senate's duty to ratify the treaty. According to the Panamanian Constitution, the treaty must be approved by the Panamanian people in a plebiscite, as approved by Article 274.

Romulo [Escobar Bethancourt] may say anything, just as he has been doing since he became Torrijos' adviser. He said these reservations and amendments are palatable. The only palatable thing here is the Panamanian people, who must express themselves; the only palatable thing here is the predominance of the nation's permanent interests over the goverment's interest, over the chief of staff's interests, over the interests of the $50 million offered to the National Guard, over the interests of the permanence of Torrijos as head of state, over the interests of all those close friends, or, as Diogenes de la Rosa said, the close enemies in power who have been feasting for the last 10 years on the public treasury which they refuse to give up. That is why they tell Torrijos the amendments and the reservations are palatable. Nothing in those amendments is palatable to the Panamanian people. On the contrary, it is dirty water, contaminated with germs that will last for 23 years and, in fact, perpetuity, but only the terms have been changed. The people have been deceived on many occasions. In the Spanish and English languages, perpetuity and permanence mean the same thing: something that is forever, that never ends.

Independent Lawyers Favor Rejection of Treaty Amendments

In a lengthy communique to the nation delivered to the communications media this afternoon, the Movement of Independent Lawyers (MAI) makes an extensive analysis of the amendments, reservations and understandings attached to the resolution of ratification of the neutrality treaty and ends by asking the government to reject said reservations.

The MAI notes that this is the only way the Republic of Panama can safeguard its sovereignty and give proof that it is consistent with the people's struggle and the tide of history, which will eventually raze all colonialist structures still existing in the world.

The extensive communique is signed by Carlos Ivan Zuniga, Bolivar Davalos, Carlos Enrique Adams, Joaquin Ortega, Juan Felipe de la Iglesia, Garcia Almengor, Mario Galindo, Tomas Herrera, Rodrigo Sanchez, Jose Manuel Faundez, Natividad Pinango, Elsa de Garcia and Diogenes Arosemena.

Matutino Urges Calm Study of Treaty Amendments

(Editorial: "At the Edge of the Great Decision")

With a high sense of responsibility that will go down in history, the revolutionary government, through the Foreign Ministry, has released to the nation the text of the U.S. Senate resolution on the Panama Canal neutrality treaty.

This information, which has reached the public before the document is officially delivered to the Panamanian Government, is intended by the government to educate our people about the changes to the treaty so they can express their comprehensive, calm and, above all, patriotic opinion.

The language used in that resolution is clear, precise, without any contradictory terms or legal jargon. The senators say what the United States wants, how it wants it and how long it wants it. They also state what that nation will not do, what must be conceded both on their part and on Panama's regarding certain clauses of the neutrality treaty. In effect, what the Senate documents convey, according to the resolution, is how the senators feel, how we should feel, how they speak and how they must be interpreted. To all of this they add how we should feel regarding thier interpretation of that treaty and how they want us to interpret what is written therein.

Going even further, the added documents specify the cases in which Panama and the United States jointly can or must act accordingly to given circumstances. And going even further they also state when they can act unilaterally in circumstances which they and/or we, jointly or by supposition [por supuesto], consider an attack against the Panama Canal's neutrality.

It is left up to the analytical minds of Panamanian jurists to make a deep and detailed study of these amendments and the amended treaty. To us, the men in the street, the Panamanians who feel and who by feeling give an opinion of mind and soul, we have only—but not least—to make an evaluation of those amendments in terms of the whole. We will obtain a clear concept of them in the light of the debates which surely will be elicited by such a significant topic and await the government's decision on behalf of the Panamanian people.

That decision (it is good to know this and to trust that it will not be any other way because there is no reason to doubt it) will never be made without regard to the interests of the fatherland. In making the decision the team led by General Torrijos will listen to as many Panamanians as wish to state their opinion regarding an issue which commits us before history. And it will be a decision born of national dignity and the course set by the people when they approved the Torrijos-Carter treaty in the 23 October 1977 plebiscite—that treaty, and not another with added documents which distort the essence of the one approved by Panama.

Because if they present us a disfigured, altered document in place of the one signed by a Panamanian in the presence of the chiefs of state of America, then we would face two treaties, that of 1903 and that of 1978, the latter having been subjected to Senate surgery without the benefit of an anesthetic and containing no Panamanian signature. The watchword of the moment is to wait calmly, analyze thoroughly and decide with dignity.

Strength Seen in Government Silence on Treaty Changes

(Danilo Caballero commentary)

The calmness of our people is tantamount to struggle. The approval of the Torrijos-Carter neutrality treaty—with the amendments, reservations and other limitations imposed on the original test by the U.S. Senate—is undoubtedly the vital focus of political expectations in Panama. This is understandable if we take into consideration that the canal problem is not only a matter of extreme sensitivity for our people but one of primary importance to the revolutionary process because it establishes a landmark in the true beginning of the decolonization of our territory. The attitude adopted by the people and the government has been the right one.

The position to be adopted now is one of impartial, comprehensive and sensible analysis of the amendments we already know and those that will undoubtedly be added to the second treaty. This position has nothing to do with the passions and resentments of the fatalism regarding our geographic position which prevailed in Panama in previous decades. An impartial analysis should be made because what is at stake is the destiny of the fatherland, the very existence of our people who are in a difficult position. A comprehensive analysis also should be made because it is impossible to analyze the new situation created by the amendments and reservations without looking at all the implications at the national and international levels. It should be a sensible analysis, because it implies that a people with our pride and sensitivity will never accept anything that would offend, even in the slightest, our dignity and our condition as free men.

The stand taken by Omar has, then, been the correct one. It is that no official position will be stated until the debates on the second treaty are held and it becomes evident what new cats the senators are going to let out of the bag. Meanwhile, the amendments and reservations are being studied from two necessary angles: the legal and the political.

We Panamanians possess the basic ability to visualize the future without hurrying and in terms of the revolutionary line.

There are the 9 years of struggle of the revolutionary government and even more directly the historic words of Omar's letter to President Carter. In this letter, our people, through the chief of government, reminded U.S. imperialism that neither our geographical size nor the difference in wealth of the two countries allows a large nation to offend the dignity of a courageous people.

Our historical struggle has been for decolonization—to remove the ignominious enclave and the U.S. military presence from our territory.

Our people approved the Torrijos-Carter treaties because they realized that we were smaller in strength and saw the treaties as a guarantee of decolonization. Logically, if the treaties deviate from their original aim of decolonization they are no longer what the people approved in the October Plebiscite. It is worthwhile to recall all of this, especially because it is the stand adopted by Omar, who together with the people and the national guard will make sure that deecolonization becomes a tangible reality for the generations to come. Consequently, we must have a clear picture of this game of amendments and reservations. We must realize that what is really desired is to limit the development of the revolutionary process by circumscribing all our aspirations. This is only one part of the problem. The other is the defeatist attitude of certain sectors which have never understood that a struggle for national liberation and a revolutionary process in a country such as ours are determined by complex situations which are not evident at first glance.

No, gentlemen of the historic fatalism, the revolution is not a party or a game. It is a very difficult science. It is a continuous struggle, and its duration cannot be determined by individual desires but by specific conditions.

Those of us who were born with the revolutionary process as a coherent voice in the media have complete trust in Omar and in our people. We know as well as everybody should that negotiations were chosen as the sacrifice with the least social cost. But the calmness of our people and revolutionary government should not be confused with apathy or lack of enthusiasm. On the contrary, that calmness is synonymous with struggle because those who are ready to give everything for the fatherland do not have to brag about it. In the revolutionary struggle calmness is a basic condition which reflects maturity. And in the same manner in which we calmly analyze the meaning of amendments and reservations we will confront any new situation that may arise and defend the honor of Panama. We are certain that the man who has placed our fatherland in a position of international dignity for the past 9 years is the one who will take up the final victory.

Columnist Examines Senate's Treaty Approval Role

("Bona Fide" column by Camilo O. Perez)

When the canal and neutrality treaties were still being negotiated, we wrote in this same column about the U.S. Senate's role in the treaties' ratification. We were not mistaken when we said that there were three alternatives:

1. That the Senate would ratify the treaties as accepted by Panama.

2. That it will definitely reject them.

3. That it will return them with reservation and amendments.

Today we are faced with the third alternative. Therefore, we believe that it would be well to reprint the column published last August. It reads as follows:

Can the Senate change or amend a treaty? Article II, Section 2, Paragraph 2 of the U.S. Constitution determines that the president can make international treaties "with the Senate's advice and consent based on a two-thirds majority vote of the senators present at the time of voting."

Notwithstanding this constitutional precept, practice as well as jurisprudence have reduced the senatorial function to the simple ratification of treaties. Therefore, the power and prerogative of negotiating international treaties has been left exclusively in presidential hands.

It is understood, however, that a pragmatic president will do everything possible to have both chambers on his side when negotiating treaties. This can be done by keeping Congress constantly informed, having the Congress' prior approval of the treaty in question or at least keeping the Senate Foreign Relations Committee informed about treaties that could present problems.

In 1936 the U.S. Supreme Court handed down a decision in this respect in the case of the United States versus the Curtiss Wright Corporation.

The Senate's specific functions begin when it is asked to approve a previously negotiated treaty. When this situation arises, the alternatives are the following:

A. Unconditionally approve the treaty in question.

B. Deny its approval.

C. Accept the treaty with conditions by stipulating a series of changes or amendments to the treaty.

However, the third option will practically create another treaty and would call for negotiations between the two parts involved. The Senate cannot, by means of amendments, impose its will on a sovereign nation. This was clearly established by the Supreme Court in the case of the Fourteen Diamond Rings versus the United States.

The above article, based on a consultation made by Dr. Hugo Spadafora, means that the third possibility, previously considered and a reality today, establishes the criteria for a rejection by means of amendments and reservations from the point of view of U.S. jurisdiction. Whatever Mr. Carter says now is in conflict with this juridical tradition. We shall continue. . . .

Aristides Royo Returns from U.S. Visit

With the return of Dr. Aristides Royo, negotiator of the Torrijos-Carter treaty, from the United States yesterday, the day ended in a suspenseful atmosphere with regard to the status of ratification of the canal documents. Approached by CRITICA at the Tocumen Airport terminal, the young negotiator was very cautious and sober in making statements, since his mission to Washington was carried out to express the official opinion of the Panamanian Government.

Dr. Royo did, however, call attention to the climate prevailing in Washington among members of the Senate. Specifically, it was learned that several senators who were in their respectives states for Easter week found quite a bit of discontent with regard to the senatorial decision to ratify the neutrality treaty. In fact, it is well known that there are already 200,000 signature on the petition to revoke the mandate of Senator DeConcini of Arizona, despite the fact that that senator suggested the famous reservation which harms the interests of Panamanians.

It is rumored in news circles that the purpose of Royo's trip to the U.S. capital was to express officially to President Carter's team of advisors the Panamanian Government's displeasure with the reservations and amendments introduced into the neutrality treaty.

Reports to Torrijos

In Farallon Chief of Government Gen. Omar Torrijos received a direct and confidential report from Aristides Royo, education minister and negotiator. Royo arrived from Washington last night, where he had been on an official mission.

Commentator Fears Precedent Set By Neutrality Treaty Changes

The results of the voting on the neutrality treaty were described by the U.S. press and political analysts in that country as a victory for President Carter.

The narrow margin by which the treaty was approved came about after what has been termed the greatest and most intense public relations and publicity campaign ever carried out by the White House. The approval of this treaty and the approval of the treaty which will be voted on in a few weeks constitute a vital objective for Carter and his administration.

It was not only a matter of Carter's interests in solving an old conflict with Panama but also a concern with other domestic and international problems connected with the treaties. In his 14 months in office the neutrality treaty has been the first document of true importance which the Carter administration succeeded in having approved at the Capitol. During these 14 months the Carter administration has been going downhill in the eyes of the U.S. public. Several news articles and commentaries have questioned the President's ability and competence to deal with the complex and difficult public affairs of the United States. The rejection of the Panama Canal treaties—after the extraordinary publicity campaign carried out by the government in favor of the treaties and after the degree of Carter's participation in it—would have had devasting effects on the image of the White House and the President. Carter spoke with each of the 100 senators at least once. He made 87 telephone calls in the past 2 weeks and called or sent messages to certain stubborn senators at least half a dozen times. The President also held meetings with civic and political leaders and newsmen from at least 35 states to elucidate and brief them on the treaties. The day before the voting, Carter made 16 telephone calls in a desperate search for the magic number of 67 senators. Despite the spectacular decorations of this White House publicity campaign, I have the feeling that in a way President Carter and his advisers miscalculated the level of influence they could exert and the degree of resistance they would find in the senators. The fact which speaks for itself in this sense is that it was not until the morning of 15 March, 30 hours before the voting that President Carter, by accepting the dismal DeConcini reservation, gathered the votes necessary to reach the key number of 67 senators.

In effect, the 23 March issue of NEWSWEEK magazine affirmed that the DeConcini reservation was an instrument to help persuade at least three other senators, Bellmon of Oklahoma, Brooke of Massachusetts and Paul Hatfield of Montana, who in the end voted for the treaty. Carter accepted the DeConcini reservation because it was the only way to get the 67 votes. Despite the fact that Carter admits in the TIME magazine article that he had given his word to Torrijos, the President of the United States could not lose the vote. He had to win it at any price. This decisive fact occurred after the U.S. media had denounced certain maneuvers made by the White House to satisfy the requests of certain senators and thus win their support. At the end of the long debate on the neutrality treaty the U.S. Government realized that a defeat would not only have negative effects on its bilateral relations with Panama and multilateral relations with Latin America, but that it would affect the image of the Carter administration in important matters such as the energy bill, the SALT talks with the USSR—a pact which, in fact, is expected to meet strong resistance in the Senate—and U.S. Middle East policy. The treaties have even been connected to the existing concern over the presence of sizeable Cuban armed forces in the Horn of Africa.

Carter administration experts estimated that the rejection of the treaties would have a negative effect on the government, especially on Jimmy Carter himself, in the future handling of other affairs and on the political future of the President and his reelection possibilities for 1980.

In regard to the fate of the other treaty, which is the main treaty of the documents, I have the feeling it will also be approved. My fear is that since the door to amendments has been opened, and a precedent has been established on reservations and understandings in the ratification solution, this treaty will also be approved with a series of reservations that could change the spirit and wording of the treaty. If that occurs, it would be up to the Panamanian Government and people to adopt a decision on the treaties, amendments, reservations and understandings. Insofar as this decision rests with General Torrijos, I believe that we would be experiencing one of those crucial moments in the life of a country and its leader, in which case Torrijos would probably be facing the most important decision ever confronting a Panamanian in the 75 years of the republic's existence.

Treaty Changes Called Unacceptable Without New Plebiscite

(Article by Antonio J. Sucre: "How Do You See the Treaties? Quite Mistreated!")

Neither the question nor answer are mine. They were offered by two prominent Panamanian jurists shortly after the U.S. Senate's approval, with amendments and reservations, of the neutrality treaty.

This is the case, and I define my position as follows:

The amendments consist of the word-for-word addition of the Torrijos-Carter declaration into Articles IV and VI of the neutrality treaty. Such amendments are "palatable" [potable], according to Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, personal adviser to the chief of state.

If we apply this gastronomic term to diplomatic terminology, it would appear to indicate that the national government has decided to support such amendments, employing the formality that, since the aforementioned unsigned declaration had received wide publicity in Panama before the plebiscite, it was tacitly approved when the treaties were approved.

However, the reservations do have a deep effect and cannot be termed anything but sophisticated surgery.

Panama cannot reject such reservations without rejecting the treaty. If Panama chooses to accept the altered treaty, it would be committing itself to negotiate the concession of military bases after the year 2000.

One way or the other, sooner or later it would have to give its consent to the presence of military bases on its territory beyond the year 2000.

And this contradicts the spirit and text of the treaties submitted to plebiscite.

Mistreated as they have been by the U.S. Senate, such treaties, once they were approved by the United States, would require a new plebiscite in Panama.

To become "palatable," such reservations would have to be filtered through a new democratic process, which is obviously what they are trying to avoid.

Torrijos, National Guard Officers Discuss National Situation

Panamanian Chief of Government and National Guard Commander in Chief Gen. Omar Torrijos met with the General Staff, the military zones chiefs and the chiefs of several National Guard combat units at the Tinajita military post and from there left for Pedregal on a 15-km military administrative march [marcha administrativa militar] which ended at air force installations at Tocumen airport.

Along the march route a large number of people greeted the participants. During the march, General Torrijos, as well as Col. Garcia Ramirez, second in command, members of the general staff and the rest of the officers exchanged opinions on various matters an devaluated the situation of the country which awaits ratification of the new canal treaties by the U.S. Congress.

Col. Garcia Ramirez noted the importance of the equality existing among the National Guard officers and the high command. During the meeting, recently commissioned officers held cordial talks with General Staff members who later met separately, apparently to discuss the future of the canal treaties.

This meeting was held behind closed doors at the air force installations at Tocumen airport. Nothing has been revealed publicly about the subjects discussed or agreements reached. So far, no authorized spokesman has made any comment.

Torrijos Address Journalists on Canal Treaties, Elections

[Speech by Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera during opening of Fifth National Journalists Congress in Santiago, Veraguas Province. on 1 April—recorded]

Executive board members of the National Union of Panamanian Journalists, Monsignor Nunez [as heard], all comrades: I wanted to take advantage of this opportunity during the national press meeting in Veraguas to make certain pronouncements which directly affect the course of the domestic and political life of the country. However, I first want to commend you on the organization, the hours of work that I know went into organizing a congress such as this one and for the great many truths that have uttered here, truths which I know and which I will summarize by recalling a single incident.

When Dr. Escobar Bethancourt spoke about the role of youth guide played by Manuel Celestino Gonzalez, I could remember that during my early years as first lieutenant and second lieutenant in the National Guard, Manuel Celestino Gonzalez used to visit the prison house regularly. From the place where we picked him up and took him to his almost regular residence, which was the model prison—the regular residence of all those whose views were opposed to the system—along that route, whether as sermonizing or advice or plain conversation, everything he said was true. Everything he said was true, and that is how one came to realize that the mission of the armed forces could not continue to be the persecution of anybody for his ideas or because his way of thinking asked for changes in the status quo.

We are almost 75 years from the day of our independence. The country's social calendar is 22 years away from the 21st century.

I mention these dates because it is necessary for us to understand that whatever we do now or fail to do is directly related to the way in which the future generations will greet the dawn of the 21st century.

This year, to speak even more specifically, this year, 1978, rife with emotions, triumphs, unpleasantness and victories, each Panamanian has to think over and become convinced that his views on the treaty should be responsible and well thought out, so that his final decision will be a contribution, will contribute to the national life a view that was well thought out in his own conscience since the government will not express any views or make final decisions or condemn or applaud what is going on right now until they return to us the treaty that we forwarded. Then, within an overall framework, we will examine what the people approved during the plebiscite and how the U.S. Senate interpreted the views that the people approved in the treaties that were submitted for discussion and approval during the plebiscite.

After that, in a wide-reaching and far-ranging way, using all means of communication, we, the government, will consult the views of this people, and within the framework of those views we will decide on the answers and the way to respond to what the United States has sent back.

This is the time when all of us, including myself, must make great efforts not to feel, feel and feel but to think, think and think and not fall into the unsound attitude of considering the returned treaty to be bad if it affects the interests of the group that it represents even if it is good for the country or the opposing view—bad for the country but good for the stability or survival of the government.

In this respect I can give full assurances to the people through all the newsmen present here that if the treaty harms the interests of the country it has to be bad for the interests of the government. This is not an observation that I have made by myself. I made it after consulting with the ranking military commands and after observing that my daily promenades [patrullaje], daily conversations and the daily dialog begun almost 10 years ago have made me realize that if the permanence in power of General Torrijos and his government team depended on selling out the homeland, selling out its dignity, selling out the dignity of those who have not even been born yet, then we would not stay in power a single minute after such a sell-out plan or idea came to light. I say this because back in 1969 and 1970, when we had not even formed a government team and when many of our plans and desires were mere ideas and not programs as they are now, we were threatened along with other guard officers who held views similar to those of the people who maintain the enclave. We were threatened that if we did not carry out what the government that we had just overthrown had agreed upon in the sense of ratifying the treaties as soon as possible, the stability of the government would be jeopardized.

That was the time when at the International Hotel—and I think in the presence of Dr. Romulo Betancourt [as heard] and others—I said that if in order to stay in power I had to betray my country, I would rather leave right away. And I say this because it has been my consistent, consistent, consistent way of thinking, and when a man is consistent in his way of thinking no fear can be harbored that he will change his conceptual, intimate, worthy truth overnight for a truth based on convenience.

I attach great importance, almost historic importance to these elections, the electoral process that has already started and whose initial stages are already being carried out, because this event coincides with the greatest international event that our country has experienced, the ratification or refusal to ratify [the treaties] and because this event comes at a time when history sees all the countries that support the Panamanian cause.

All countries without exception—not one has failed to voice its solidarity so far—have their eyes set on the domestic and politcal behavior of the government and people of Panama.

I understand that every era, every year, every political year, every stage has its development plan and its politcal leadership plan. I understand that every era is marked by a certain attitude, and I think it is high time to say that the government is willing to assume an attitude, to assume the initiative of an attitude of realignment of the politcal structures. In this sense, the executive branch has not adopted and does not plan to adopt an unyielding, sectarian attitude because unyielding and sectarian attitudes destabilize the government and could perhaps lead to the reappearance of the elements of social unrest which compelled the National Guard to become involved in national life. What we do will be done with the conviction that we should make an effort to end the causes of discontent that permanently placed the population—the students, the workers, the Panamanians [as heard]—in opposition to the public forces, and we would not even want to remember those things of the past. That is why we cannot be unyielding, precisely because we were used almost in a (sports-like) fashion to correct the intransigent attitudes of other governments.

If after August, which I am leaving open for you to think about or to analyze, the incumbent and the elected representatives feel that adjustments have to be made to the constitution to accommodate the legislative, administrative and political structures so that the country can enter a stage of increased consultations, the government will not take issue with this, and it is willing to take the initiative to discuss whether the next representatives assembly can include with effective voice and vote, with full legislative powers, the vice presidents elected in every province into the National Legislation Council.

Furthermore, as food for thought, if you do not feel that this is sufficient, we are even [willing] to include the entire assembly, to grant the entire assembly the real power to legislative and not have any laws that are not approved by consensus, a consensus of half the members plus one, and this would compel the executive branch to consult more extensively, more profoundly and more regularly on laws which have great significance in the national life. This also compels the representative to consult the various opinion groups existing in his electoral jurisdiction because if he does not consult with them and airs views that are not checked out with the people who eletced him, he could make any of the mistakes that would lead to the revoking of his mandate.

All these ideas are aimed at achieving a somewhat more flexible administration, a legislation that is closer to the people and is the result of greater consultation. The executive branch would also be willing to share its responsibilities in certain important administration post, such as certain autonomous agencies, by submitting the appointment of certain directors to the approval of the representative assembly. In other words, if the executive branch submits the appointment and the assembly does not confirm it, the assembly would be involved in the election of those who from prominent positions have to cope with major national work groups. Thus we are giving the 505 representatives what in the United Nations could be called a veto power.

The public forces which I am honored to command do not harbor and have never harbored the intention of making incorrect, domineering, terrorizing use of Article 2 of the constitution. What does scare the public forces, and I want to state its through the most outstanding representatives [of the people], is the prospect of going back to those times when the public forces were consulted only to be ordered to fix the bayonet and disrupt the tranquillity, the liberties of all those men who, filled with extreme emotion regarding the cause of their country, could not endure so many injustices and consequently disrupted order by staging demonstrations. What order did they disrupt. I wonder. The order established by the governments of the chosen group and for the chosen group.

Indeed, the officers have asked me that if there is any change, any constitutional adjustment, [cualquier cambio, cualquier ajuste constitucional] it reduce the possibilities that the public forces may be used as forces of revenge or reprisal to correct the errors, the neglect, the carelessness and the frauds of the governments, as we were so often used in the past.

I am airing all these views because I am convinced of the value of the system, a system which honors the natural leaders in every community, a system which gives opportunities to all those who really deserve them and a system in which leading a man to the polling booth to cast his vote of support for the natural leader is a fact that is viewed as a conversation between two neighbors and as a commitment that one neighbor enters into with another. It is a system that is based on real, not apparent, democracy, a system which tackles real, not apparent, problems, a system which aims for real solutions and not apparent solutions. If, despite the system, isolated instances have occured in the administration, and isolated instances have indeed occurred, they had to occur. [sentence as heard] Let us not deceive ourselves, they will not be completely eradicated. But they are isolated instances. They do not constitute the overall conduct of the government. Proof of this is that, once they were discovered, punishment was meted out. How? The greatest punishment for whoever misuses state funds or his powers is not prosecution, because prosecutors hardly even punish anymore since the thieves do not leave a bill, and if one does not have a bill they are not punished. The greatest punishment is publicity. That is it. The press commending, or punishing [sancionando] someone who does not deserve to be applauded. I say that this system aims for real solutions [causas], because throughout 9 years we have been able to introduce many real solutions. We have been able to eradicate many problems the lack of solution of which once kept the people in a constant state of protest. But back then it was much easier for the governments to stay in power because they had a well-behaving and ordinary [adocenada] guard which was capable of hurting, imprisoning or killing even the lowliest student representative or even the lowliest son of this poor people. Thank you. [applause]

Negotiator Lopez Guevara Analyzes DeConcini Reservation

The government has sponsored a series of informational meetings with communications media representatives to explain those points of the treaties which the government feels should be made clear to the community. The second meeting of this series was held today with negotiator Carlos Alfredo Lopez Guevara presiding. Lopez Guevara began by saying that there is a basic problem in the usage of the words, conditions, reservations and understandings. According to Lopez Guevara, these are terms used by the Senate in its internal relations with the U.S. President. What must be clear, Lopez Guevara said, is that the two countries are bound by the contents of the notes exchanged on the ratification documents. He added that whatever is said in exchange notes will also be negotiated, and the two countries will be bound by it.

However, Lopez Guevara said that Panama has formally requested these documents in order to have a more specific idea of the scope of the terms used by the Senate and their connotation in the U.S. legal system.

Lopez Guevara explained the meaning of the word reservation as it is used in international law. He said that it means a counterporposal made by one party to the other. This counterproposal can be accepted, rejected nor negotiated upon by the other party. If one of the parties rejects the counterproposal or reservation and at the same time presents another, this must be done before the exchange of notes because one cannot participate in the exchange ceremony with reservations.

Lopez Guevara described the exchange of notes as a ceremony that should be carried out based on the identical English and Spanish versions of the text previously approved by the two parties, the United States and Panama in this case.

During the question and answer period, Lopez Guevara expressed his point of view by stressing that he feels it is important for Panama to reiterate the principle of nonintervention in the exchange of notes. According to Lopez Guevara, not as a negotiator or government official, but in his own personal opinion, the two amendments known as the leadership amendments are an expansion of the Torrijos-Carter memorandum of understanding issued on 14 October 1977. According to Lopez Guevara, the Nunn reservation does not contradict specific regulations of the treaty because in the same fashion in which Panama can negotiate commercial and agriculture treaties with the United States it can also negotiate in the future a possible U.S. military presence.

Lopez Guevara added, still expressing his personal opinion, that just as a constitutional regulation could be used to dispose of the Nunn reservation, there are legal arguments which could also be used to detract from the value of this reservation.

Lopez Guevara answered a question regarding Aristides Royo's recent trip to Washington by saying that today's meeting was not held for the purpose of releasing news but for the journalists and government officials to talk. He referred to Royo's trip to Washington as a dialog held by the two parties.

During the meeting Lopez Guevara said on three different occasions that the national government has not adopted a position regarding the amendments and reservations introduced by the U.S. senators in the ratification process in the United States. He said that the government will adopt a position as soon as the U.S. Senate completes the U.S. ratification process. He described a preliminary statement as unnecessary.

Replying to questions, Lopez Guevara said that the documents issued by the Foreign Ministry would open what he termed to be a full range of possibilities regarding a national consensus. In giving his opinion as a lawyer, he stressed that if the amendments and reservations introduced by the Senate and included in the ratification resolution involve substantial changes to the treaties approved by the Panamanian people, then another plebiscite would have to be held.

However, Lopez Guevara made his very personal interpretation of the DeConcini reservation. He said that it is a naked and bare-faced interpretation of Article 4 of the neutrality treaty. He said this naked and bare-faced presentation is in fact more offensive, but that it does not detract from what is stated in Article 4 of the neutrality treaty. However, Lopez Guevara conceded that DeConcini's reasons for the reservation given to the Senate on 16 March would serve, in case of doubt, as a reference point to clarify the extent of the reservation approved and included in the resolution of ratification. Lopez Guevara estimated that if Panama makes an effort to reaffirm the nonintervention principle expressed in the exchange of notes, this principle would prevail over the DeConcini reservation because it has legal precedence. In any case, Lopez Guevara replied to questions of possible U.S. intervention in Panama as a result of the DeConcini reservation. First, he said, the U.S. attitude at the present time would not permit the disembarkation of Marines, as in Santo Domingo. Second, after the U.S. experience in Vietnam, the Senate would not permit U.S. troops to be sent abroad again. Third, the attitude of the U.S. people is changing. He noted in this respect that it had not taken him, Lopez Guevara, more than 10 minutes to change the mind of an average U.S. citizen by explaining things to him.

Fourth, he has faith in what he perceives to be the honesty of U.S. youth.

Lopez Guevara rejected the notion that during the neutrality treaty debates the U.S. senators made a show of arrogance by taking into consideration only the interests of their own country without any consideration for the small country they were dealing with. Lopez Guevara mentioned the names of two or three senators, including Frank Church, who spoke in favor of Panama. The Senate is made up of 100 senators. He did not make any comments on the statements of minority leader Howard Baker, who immediately after the voting on the neutrality treaty told the U.S. press that he had never before received such a large amount of mail as that received by the Senate against the Panama Canal treaties.

Even though Lopez Guevara showed respect for freedom of the press, a freedom accepted by the Panamanian Foreign Ministry itself, he warned of the danger of elaborating on the possibilities of intervention opened by the DeConcini reservation, noting that this could serve as a precedent and that there was no reason to play into the hand of the North Americans.

Columnist Calls Some Treaty Amendments Acceptable

("Macheteando" column by Mario Augusto Rodriquez: "Acceptable Amendments")

Among the additions which the U.S. Senate made to the Torrijos-Carter treaty to transform it into a different treaty, there are, in my opinion, some which would be acceptable or, even more, would have to be accepted by our government and people. I refer to those which constitute only a transcription of the memorandum of understanding agreed to by President Carter and Chief of Government Torrijos before the treaties were submitted in a plebiscite to the Panamanian people. It is true that the memorandum was never signed by either Carter or Torrijos. But it was publicly accepted by both government leaders, that is to say, it is backed by their word. And the word of a statesman, of a government leader, is worth as much as or more than his signature. In Panama's case it is true that the memorandum was not included among the documents specifically listed on the ballot. But it is equally true that its text was known much in advance, that it was public knowledge that General Torrijos had not only approved it but had expressed his willingness to sign it. That is to say, when we went to the polls and chose the affirmative answer by a majority of over two-thirds, we knew exactly that the corresponding texts were interpreted and would be applied in accordance with the explanation contained in the memorandum subsequently added as an "amendment" by the Senate.

In addition, the text of the memorandum of understanding in no way changes the significance of the dispositions originally included in the Torrijos-Carter treaty concerning neutrality.

Immediately after the "amendments" consisting of the Torrijos-Carter memorandum of understanding come the "understandings" added by the Senate on its own account and at its own risk. The first "understanding" refers specifically to Article V of the Torrijos-Carter treaty on neutrality. It is the most important article for Panama and in a clear and precise way guarantees our rights and responsibilities after the year 2000.

That article is also convenient for the United States because it guarantees that Panama will not be able to permit the military forces of any other country to occupy areas which up until that date had been occupied—although in an evidently arbitrary way—by the U.S. military. But it appears that not even that guarantee was sufficiently satisfactory for the minority of conservative senators who were able to impose their prejudices and perplexities "democratically" upon the majority of their colleagues and even the Government of the United States.

Torrijos Letter Explains Stand on Treaty Ratification

Dr. Jorge E. Illueca has explained to each and every one of the United Nations permanent delegates Panama's official position on the amendments, reservations and agreements introduced into the Torrijos-Carter neutrality treaty.

Dr. Illueca, our representative at that important international organization, explained to all the delegates that the Panamanian Government has a specific method to deal with the recent developments connected with the Senate's decision to introduce reservations and amendments into the neutrality treaty. At the right moment, he added, the Panamanian Government will announce its final decision. The document was drafted by our Foreign Ministry.

The Panamanian document was immediately translated into all the official working languages of the United Nations.

Meanwhile, it has been learned that the Panamanian chief of government has sent a letter to all presidents, chiefs of government, kings and other leaders through the representatives of the more than 115 states that comprise the United Nations. The letter explains Panama's position on the U.S. Senate's current process of ratification of the treaties.

Jurists Score DeConcini Treaty Reservation

At a panel meeting sponsored by the Panamanian Executive Association [APEDE] last night, Panamanian jurists Julio Linares and Cesar Quintero advocated the complete rejection of the DeConcini reservation to the neutrality treaty.

Both agreed that the DeConcini reservation contradicts the originally signed neutrality treaty because it grants the United States the right to intervene in Panama, to occupy our entire territory militarily and to exercise sovereign rights at least over the occupied areas.

The two jurists pointed out that any reservation to a treaty entered into between two nations is considered to be a rejection of the treaty, since it is an attempt to modify or limit the scope of the treaty, and that the reservations made to the neutrality treaty affect the structure of the treaties as originally approved.

Dr. Quintero said he doubts whether the U.S. Senate will ratify the Panama Canal Treaty without reservations and amendments. To him, this is the more important of the two treaties.

Dr. Quintero also pointed to the serious threat to the integrity of Panama as a nation posed by the reservation presented by Senator Nunn, which states that after the year 2000, Panama and the United States may at any time after 31 December 1999 make agreements on the fulfillment of their responsibilities to maintain the neutrality regime, as well as on the stationing of U.S. military forces or the maintenance in the Republic of Panama of U.S. defense sites after the date that both nations may deem appropriate. Dr. Quintero explained that he feels that sooner or later Panama will have to consent to the presence of military bases on its territory beyond the year 2000.

The distinguished Panamanian lawyers agreed that for approval of the neutrality treaty, the national government must call a second plebiscite because the constitution of the Republic of Panama establishes that to ratify a treaty of the type with which we are concerned, it is imperative to have the approval of the Panamanian people and the executive branch. On the other hand, the jurist explained, if the treaty is rejected by the Panamanian people, the national government does not need to call a plebiscite.

Dr. Quintero said he is of the opinion that President Carter is committed to the ratification of the treaty. It is clear, however, he added, that he cannot reject any of the amendments or reservations introduced by the U.S. Senate.

If the treaties are rejected by the Republic of Panama, they would become ineffective, and a new period of negotiations could be reopened.

The reservations made to the neutrality treaty, according to Dr. Linares, are contrary not only to the UN Charter but to a number of treaties which prohibit the intervention of a state in the internal affairs of another.

Dr. Carlos Sucre, another panelist invited by APEDE to take part in the broad debate on the reservations, amendments and accords to the neutrality treaty, reserved the right to express his opinion after the U.S. Senate decision on the Panama Canal treaty.

Some persons attending the panel, members of APEDE, questioned the need to wait until the Panama Canal treaty ratification, while others opposed ratification of the treaties with the reservations introduced by the U.S. Senate.

Independent Lawyers Call for Rejection of Treaty Changes

(Manifesto No. 4 Issued by Movement of Independent Lawyers)

The Movement of Independent Lawyers (MAI), which has carefully followed the development of the U.S. Senate deliberations regarding the ratification of the Torrijos-Carter treaties, believes that since the first phase of the ratification process is over, it should explain its position on what that legislative body has done so far.

As the public knows, the MAI opposed the ratification of the Torrijos-Carter treaties by the Republic of Panama on the grounds that the treaties, far from satisfying the legitimate aspirations for which the Panamanian people have struggled, imposed onerous burdens on our country which are in no way justifiable and which deeply harm the most cherished national interests.

When the U.S. Senate began formal consideration of the treaties, the MAI decided to refrain from making a public pronouncement regarding the treaties or the process of ratification. Two basic considerations justified this decision: first, that anything the movement said would not exert any desirable influence on the decision reached by that legislative body with regard to the matter concerning all of us. The second and perhaps more important reason concerns the MAI's interests in not having its position regarding the treaties confused with that of the senators who, for reasons very different from ours, opposed ratification of the treaties.

In the face of the fait accompli of the amendments and reservations (hereinafter to be called the senatorial changes) which the U.S. Senate has introduced into the misnamed "Treaty Regarding the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal," the national government has decreed an official silence pending the completion of the ratification process. This silence, if it were really observed, would perhaps be justified by virtue of the wide-ranging and serious consequences that will necessarily result from whatever decision the government reaches with regard to the acceptance or rejection of the amended treaties. However, a source of concern lies in the fact that while decreeing the above mentioned silence the government, in the voice of Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, announced that the senatorial reforms are "potable" ["potables"], which is equivalent to saying that they are acceptable. Apart from the fact that this statement is a prejudgment regarding the basis of the problem which allegedly is to be studied, it could undoubtedly also induce many foreign governments which have supported our cause to hasten unwittingly to the support of the amended treaty, when in the final analysis the position of the Panamanian Government must be precisely that of rejecting the new contractual texts as the historic meaning of the Panamanian people's struggle demands. The situation that would result from such actions by foreign governments would in no way be favorable to our national interests.

In view of the Senate changes and the approval accorded them initially by the Panamanian Government, the MAI believes that the reasons for maintaining silence no longer exists, and it believes that the time has come to explain its position with regard to the ramifications of these changes.

As far as is known on the date of this communique, the senatorial changes consist of: A) incorporation of the Torrijos-Carter statement of understanding into the neutrality treaty; B) provision for the possibility that the Republic of Panama may grant to the United States of America, after the year 2000, the right to maintain military bases on Panamanian territory; and C) concession to the United States, independent of the other provisions of the treaty, of the unrestricted, unconditional and unilateral right to take whatever measures it considers convenient—including the right to use its armed forces on Panamanian territory without the consent of the territorial sovereign—in the event that the canal is closed or its operations are interfered with for any reason, including purely domestic matters.

The Torrijos-Carter statement of understanding of 14 October 1977, as the MAI stated from the beginning, reiterated by way of clarification certain rights injurious to Panama which are granted to the United States in the neutrality treaty—rights which also constitute a most emphatic denial of neutrality in the true sense of the word. From this viewpoint, the Torrijos-Carter statement of understanding, despite its faulty wording, does not grant to the United States rights other than those contained in the treaty to which the statement of understanding refers. Consequently, the incorporation of said agreement into the text of the neutrality treaty, although formally an amendment of the treaty, in the main merely restates the harmful concessions granted in the treaty. Therefore, the amendment follows the literal sense of said understanding which repeatedly refers to the treaty and is based specifically on Articles 4 and 5.

The other two senatorial changes mentioned in previous paragraphs, on the contrary, if accepted by the Republic of Panama, would undoubtedly constitute substantial changes in form and content of the neutrality treaty, to the extent that the United States, through these changes, has proposed to the Republic of Panama the conclusion of a treaty that differs from the original.

One such change, ignoring the literal sense of Article V of the neutrality treaty, according to which after the year 2000 "only the Republic of Panama shall maintain military forces, defense sites and military installations within its territory," considers the possibility that the Republic of Panama will grant the United States the right to have military bases on Panamanian territory after that date. It is said that this change is without substance since it is always within the power of any state, in the exercise of its sovereign rights, to amend at its own discretion through bilateral agreements the treaties it has concluded with another state. This argument is not valid. In effect, it happens that one of the aspects of the neutrality treaty highlighted by the national government was the very fact that it called for the dismantling of existing U.S. military bases in Panama by the year 2000, a fact which might have induced some states interested in this dismantling to take part in the neutrality treaty by becoming signatories to it. With this adherence completed, repeatedly government spokesmen [as published] would no longer be a bilateral agreement but would become a multilateral agreement with the consequence that any change which anyone desired to make in it would have to be agreed on by all the states signing the treaty. In contrast, the senatorial amendment under discussion would permit the Republic of Panama and the United States without the consent of the other states taking part in the treaty, to conclude bilateral military agreements to permit the United States to maintain bases in Panama after the year 2000. Such agreements would ruin the neutrality treaty even more. This being the case, no state which is not within the sphere of U.S. influence would be party to this treaty. Nobody who studies the ramifications of the senatorial reservation in the light of the aforementioned can say that the reservation is harmless.

The other change which has been mentioned, that of Senator Dennis DeConcini, would give the United States the right to take any measures it deems necessary, including the use of its armed forces in Panamanian territory, if the canal is closed or its operations are interfered with for any reason, even when such reasons pertain exclusively to the internal affairs of the Republic of Panama.

Viewed from any angle, the DeConcini reservation is a reprehensible and outrageous U.S. attempt to get the Republic of Panama to give the United States the right to intervene in affairs within our exclusive jurisdiction If anyone doubts that it extends this far, let him read the words Senator DeConcini used to support his reservation in the U.S. Senate.

The MAI has no choice but to express its most profound indignation at the lack of respect the DeConcini reservation shows for the Republic of Panama. Fundamentally, its approval is a challenge to the Panamanian people's nationalist calling, a calling which has apparently been underestimated by the U.S. Senate.

If the DeConcini amendment had been proposed by U.S. Government representatives at the treaty negotiation stage, it would undoubtedly have been rejected. There is no valid reason to accept it now or to employ legal or diplomatic sophistry to minimize its repercussions and to ignore the irreparable harm which its approval by the Panamanian Government would do to the Panamanian state and nation.

On the other hand, it should be noted that in connection with the forementioned senatorial changes it is clear that the U.S. Senate has not approved the Torrijos-Carter treaty. To pretend otherwise is to fail to see the truth and the legal facts. As treaty writers Moore, Kelsen, Hackworth, Verdross, Rousseau, Accioly, Podesta Costa, Oppenheim, Shwarzenberg and Anzilotti point out, in bilateral treaties reservations are equivalent to a rejection of the signed treaty and should be viewed as an offer to obtain a new treaty. This, no more and no less, is what the U.S. Government will be proposing to the Republic of Panama when it asks Panama to accept the reservations approved by the U.S. Senate.

The unequivocal rejection of said reservation is the only way in which the Republic of Panama can safeguard its sovereignty and demonstrate that it is on the side of the struggle of its people and with the tide of history that will sweep away all the colonialist structures that remain in the world. To accept these reservations is to condemn the present and future generations to having to hear once again the phrase which U.S. Secretary of State Hay uttered in 1903 when he said that the treaty is rife with clauses that every Panamanian patriot should object to.

REVOLUTIONARY STUDENTS ISSUE ANTITREATY COMMUINQUE

(Communique Issued by Revolutionaary Students Front; Read by Member Guillermo Calvo—Date Not Given)

In view of the situation presently prevailing in the country, in which the canal issue is the main concern, the FER-29 [Revolutionary Students Front] finds it necessary to explain its position to the citizenry.

The treaty is a manifestation at our level of the efforts being carried out worldwide by the Yankee imperialists to improve their image and that of the capitalist system at a time when the system is experiencing one of its worst economic crises.

At present, the national liberation movements in Asia and Africa have weakened the political and economic domination of the United States of America. Therefore, on this continent, the Torrijos-Carter treaty has been signed as a mechanism to maintain the domination of the Yankees in Latin America—their strategic rearguard in the face of the defeats they have suffered at the hands of popular forces on other continents.

Role of the Government in the Negotiations:

The Torrijos government maintained throughout the negotiating process a position of defeatism and surrender as a result of its economic bankruptcy and its $2 billion debt to the Yankees. The outcome of these negotiations behind the people's backs—after a discussion in which the freedom of expression of those of us who opposed the treaty was curtailed—was a treaty which from the legal point of view is a monstrous aberration and which politically and economically favors the Yankee imperialists and the dominant Panamanian classes and leaves untouched the causes of conflict between the United States and Panama.

Ratification of the Neutrality Pact and its Amendments and Reservations:

After a series of insults was hurled at Panama by the U.S. Senate, the neutrality treaty was ratified with its respective amendments and reservations. These amendments and reservations are designed to clarify the ambiguities contained in the neutrality pact and clearly establish the framework for U.S. action in Panama.

The reservation of Senator Dennis DeConcini established . . right to interfere whenever the United States for any reason unilaterally considers free transit through the waterway to be threatened. We know that for the Yankees a student strike, a situation of economic crisis or a request by workers for a wage increase would be sufficient motive for the U.S. President to order a military invasion.

The government is therefore at a crossroads. It must either reject the amendment or allow intervention. The military men who are in power cannot act freely since they respond to the interests of the rich classes, interests which are the same as those of the imperialists, and the amendments serve as a guarantee by which the United States can protect its economic and political interests throughout Latin America. If the government accepts these amendments, it will be legalizing a permanent intervention in our fatherland and it will be stripping itself of its revolutionary mask to revealing what it has always been—servile, defeatist and traitorous.

We know that the government will not reject the amendments or the treaty because the treaty is its last means of emerging from the economic asphyxiation in which it finds itself as a result of its irrational policy of promoting models of development which favor nonproductive capital sectors such as commerce and services.

Now that the true imperialist nature of the Torrijos-Carter treaties has been revealed, the popular movement, which from the beginning strongly rejected the treaties, has stepped up its repudiation of them. Panamanian revolutionaries and patriots have established as their immediate goal the rejection, not only of the amendments, but also of both treaties, since they are injurious to national sovereignty and dignity. We must shake off once and for all the mirage of an easy victory and realize that the struggle will be long and hard and full of sacrifice if we are to perform the tasks that the situation demands. Now more than ever, we must defend our right to make decisions regarding a problem that is so important to our people—the problem of the canal. An attempt to usurp this right is being made by those who seek only a more viable formula for continuing the exploitation of our people. Sovereignty or death, we shall triumph.

TREATY AMENDMENTS SEEN AS CHANGING NEUTRALITY CONCEPT

("Conciencia Publica" column by Miguel Angel Moreno Gongora: "The Declaration of Understanding")

In the 23 October 1977 plebiscite we approved the Panama Canal treaties together with their annexes and protocols, which several weeks earlier, on 7 September, had been signed by Carter and Torrijos in a pompous and spectacular ceremony in Washington. This plebiscite was preceded by a worrisome and hasty public debate in which the opponents of the United States had only 45 days to express ideas and establish positions.

The chief of government of Panama arrived in Washington, and after his meeting with Carter on 14 October a declaration of understanding was issued referring to Article IV of the neutrality treaty which interpolates the criteria that "each of the two countries, according to their respective constitutional procedures, will defend the canal against any threat to its neutrality and consequently will have the right to act in case of aggression or threat directed against the canal or the peaceful transit of ships through the canal," and that "the neutrality treaty provides that the warships and auxiliary ships of the United States and Panama will have the right to transit the canal in an expeditious manner." This has the intention, and it will be so interpreted, of insuring the transit of those ships through the canal as quickly as possible, without obstacles, with simplified documentation and, in case of necessity or emergency, to go to the head of the line to transit the canal quickly.

The North Americans, who have now assumed the power to determine what the Panamanians aspire to, feel, reject or want, said that the declaration does not require another plebiscite and that the senators could therefore approve it as an amendment. But they were wrong again because from this moment on, in my opinion and in the opinion of many Panamanians, it is not necessary to expect further amendments, reservations, conditions or understandings to consider the neutrality treaty changed.

The inclusion of the declaration of understanding as an amendment to the neutrality treaty constitutes a substantial change to the sense and objective of the treaty because granting special concessions and privileges to U.S. ships changes the neutrality concept, which means no participation in any state of belligerency and complete impartiality. It also represents a negation of the will of the people. If the declaration was not included in the treaties passed in the plebiscite, it is clear that it does not have our consent.

The senators, not content with the declaration of understanding and demonstrating a great lack of confidence, even with President Carter, and with irrepressible colonialist voracity, went even further and introduced, through an "understanding," the concept that the interpretation of the state of "necessity or emergency" for any U.S. ship to go to the head of the line to transit the canal in an expeditious manner will be made unilaterally by the United States. This means that every time that the United States "feels like it," it can allege "necessity or emergency," and we cannot even express our opinion. We have no right to dispute it.

If the introduction of the declaration of understanding as an amendment substantially altered the will of the Panamanian people, the understanding which confers the right of unilateral interpretation to the United States of the meaning of "necessity or emergency" constitutes the greatest disregard for our dignity as a free and sovereign nation.

MATUTINO COLUMNIST URGES REJECTION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

(Article by Carlos Bolivar Pedreschi)

At the beginning of the very brief and unique national debate over the Torrijos-Carter treaties in October 1977, some Panamanians concerned about the country's fate pointed out the possible interpretation that could be made of some of the treaties' clauses. One of these clauses was precisely Clause IV of the "Treaty Regarding the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal," which virtually made the United States the only guarantor of the canal's so-called neutrality and its operation.

With regard to this clause, we said that the way in which it was improvidently drafted was laying the foundation for the interpretation that the neutrality treaty was giving the United States the right to intervene militarily in Panamanian territory by way of a supposed defense of the canal's neutrality and operation. During the negotiations, when the government had not yet departed from some positions which we at the time thought were positive, the government itself was aware of the risk in officially granting the U.S. Government the status of being the only guarantor of neutrality. As a matter of fact, government spokesmen said, with sufficient foundation in our opinion, that "in providing that the United States is the only guarantor, we are granting it the right to intervene unilaterally in Panama in the 21st century."

This obvious risk of U.S. military meddling in Panama in the 21st century, which is implied by recognizing the United States as the only guarantor of neutrality, was explicitly corroborated by the negotiators and U.S. officials. In fact, this time the Panamanian Government could not say, regarding U.S. military intervention in Panama, that it was deceived by the negotiators and other U.S. Government officials. Colonialism has spoken clearly on this occasion. As a matter of fact no other conclusion can be deduced from the statements made by spokesmen of that colonialism which we proceed to transcribe:

". . . The treaty does not place limitations on our ability to take the necessary measures in case the canal's neutrality is threatened or violated" (statement by negotiator Linowitz published in the Miami HERALD on 9 September 1977).

"The United States not only can decide unilaterally to intervene in Panama after the year 2000, but in the next 23 years it will be exclusively the decision of the United States to determine how many soldiers should stay in the Canal Zone to defend the canal" (statement by U.S. Defense Secretary Harold Brown, published in LA ESTRELLA DE PANAMA on 28 September 1977).

And finally, here is what the letter and spirit of the neutrality treaty means to the U.S. Government:

". . . The treaties give U.S. forces the right to defend the canal even against Panama" (statement by George S. Brown, chief of staff of the U.S. Armed Forces, published by the Miami HERALD on 27 September 1977).

But even if some might have understood that the U.S. right to intervene militarily in Panama after the year 2000 was limited to military intervention in the Panamanian territory known as the Canal Zone—an action still sufficiently harmful to the national sovereignty and dignity—it now seems that according to one of the conditions presented by the Senate for the ratification and validation of the Treaty. Regarding the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal, this right of perpetual U.S. military intervention in Panama is extended to all of the national territory. This is a right which not even the infamous 1903 treaty granted the U.S. Government. Provision No. 1 approved by the U.S. Senate as a condition for ratification and validation of the neutrality treaty literally and clearly states:

"(1) Notwithstnding the provisions of Article V or any other provision of the treaty, if the canal is closed or its operations are interfered with, The Republic of Panama and the United States of America shall each independently have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes, including the use of military force in Panama, as the case may be." [as published]

The quoted provision leaves no doubt that the government and the Panamanians who accept the amendments, reservations and conditions are accepting in 1978 the perpetual right of a foreign power to intervene militarily in the sacred territory of the fatherland. And this time those who do so will be unable to denounce colonialism and its spokesmen for having deceived us and for not speaking clearly. And if these amendments, conditions and reservations signify decolonization and national liberation, then obviously political language has lost all ability to communicate.

The quoted provision by which the U.S. Senate expressly understands that the neutrality treaty gives the United States the right to use military force in Panama very clearly means that the government and the Panamanians who accept this provision are accepting that at some time, U.S. troops can be in any part of Panamanian territory, not excluding the cities of David, Penonome, Colon, La Palma, Porras Park, Santiago Square, Avenue A or the University of Panama, to cite just a few examples. And this would evidently mean the return in 1978 to stages in our history that have already been overcome by the efforts of even the traditional parties, stages when, as in 1925, the U.S. military troops installed themselves in our Santa Ana Square under the pretext of maintaining order and at the same time crushed a tenant movement. If this humiliating condition proposed by the U.S. Senate is considered acceptable then one would have to reach the absurd conclusion that there is no colonialist contamination in Panama.

In view of the seriousness of the situation arising from the amendments, reservations and conditions, we patriotically urge the national government to reject them and ask the Panamanian people to express their totally justifiable repudiation of them. We firmly believe that the obligatory rejection of the amendments, reservations and conditions by the national government will be backed by a united country and will result in a real national consensus which is necessary to analyze the risks and alternatives of a truly national canal policy. As we expressed previously, because of the disproportion of the forces involved, the nationalist cause extends beyond one man and one government and for some time even all of us together will not be enough.

EMERGENCY AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1978—CONFERENCE REPORT

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the hour of 9 o'clock a.m. having arrived, the Senate will now proceed, as in legislative session, to the consideration of the conference report on H.R. 6782. The time for debate on this conference report is limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) and the Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE), with the vote on adoption of the conference report to occur at 11 o'clock a.m. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6782) to permit marketing orders to include provisions concerning marketing promotion, including paid advertisement, of raisins and distribution among handlers of the pro rata costs of such promotion, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of April 6, 1978.)

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Bill Seale of Senator HUDDLESTON's staff, Nancy Foster of Senator STONE's staff, and Bill Motes of Senator CLARK's staff be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of the conference report on H.R. 6782, including all rollcall votes thereon.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TALMADGE. Further, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following staff members of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of the conference report on H.R. 6782, including all rollcall votes thereon:

Henry Casso, Carl Rose, Dale Stansbury, Phil Fraas, Bill Bates, Karen Schubeck, William Taggart, Glenn Tussey, Morgan Williams, and Stu Hardy.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that William Twilley, of my staff, be granted the privileges of the floor during the consideration and debate on the agricultural bill.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the Chair has already reported the conference report on H.R. 6782, the Emergency Agricultural Act of 1978.

This legislation grew out of 2 weeks of exhaustive hearings conducted by the Senate Committee on Agriculture, nutrition, and forestry during February and March on the economic crisis confronting American agriculture.

Our committee heard testimony from more than 200 witnesses, most of them grassroots farmers and ranchers from all sections of the Nation. The urgent message that our committee received from these hearings was that a great segment of American agriculture was in deep financial distress. We heard in no uncertain terms that farmers needed help to produce this year's crops—and they needed it now.

Immediately following these hearings, our committee reported major farm emergency legislation, because time was of the essence, our committee chose a House-passed bill dealing with Federal marketing orders for raisins as a vehicle to obtain the quickest possible consideration of the emergency farm legislation.

The Senate passed the bill on March 21. On the following day the House asked for a conference on the bill, H.R. 6782, and the Senate agreed.

I had hoped that the conference could meet during the Easter recess so that we might have legislation ready for consideration when the Congress reconvened on Monday of last week. Unfortunately, prior commitments of several members of the conference made this impossible. Therefore, the conference got down to work on the bill on our first day back last Monday. The conference completed action on Wednesday, and the report is now before the Senate.

Mr. President, I wish to state at the outset that the substitute bill agreed to by the conference is considerably changed from the measure that the Senate approved on March 21. Several provisions that were written into the bill by the committee and by Senate floor amendments were eliminated.

As a result of the conference deliberation, a modified bill has been agreed upon. It consists of four titles.

Title I incorporates a modified version of the flexible parity proposal of which the distinguished Senator from Kansas, Mr. DOLE, is the principal author. It provides for a graduated scale of target prices for the 1978 crops of wheat, feed grains, and upland cotton based on the amount of acreage an individual farmer agrees to set aside from production.

For wheat, the range scale is from a target price of $3.50 per bushel for a 20 percent set-aside to $5.04 per bushel—roughly parity—for a 50-percent set-aside.

For corn, the range is from $2.40 per bushel for a 10-percent set-aside to $3.45 per bushel for a 50-percent set-aside.

The target prices of other feed grains would be established on a fair and reasonable relationship to corn.

For cotton, the bill sets a minimum target price of 60 cents per pound. The price would be increased to 72 cents per pound for a 35-percent set-aside and to 84 cents for a 50-percent set-aside.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table showing the entire range of set-asides and target prices for the covered commodities be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Wheat

Setaside	Target level
20 percent	$3.50
35 percent	4.25
50 percent	5.04

Corn

Setaside	Target level
10 percent	2.40
35 percent	3.05
50 percent	3.45

Cotton

Setaside	Target level
50 percent	.84

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the effect of the flexible parity approach would be to increase substantially minimum target prices established under the 1977 Farm Act for this year's crops. Those target prices currently are set at $3.00 for wheat, $2.10 for corn and 52 cents for cotton.

Title I of the conference bill also increased the loan rates on 1978 crops. Under the bill, the loan rates would go from $2.25 to $2.55 per bushel for wheat, from $2.10 to $2.25 for corn, and from 44 cents to 48 cents for cotton.

Title II of the conference bill is the "gasohol" provision. It would authorize the secretary of agriculture to permit land set aside or diverted from production in 1978 to be planted to crops, other than those for which a set-aside is provided, that might be converted to industrial hydrocarbons as fuel.

This title would further authorize the Secretary in future years, when there may be no set-aside acres, to make incentive payments to farmers to produce crops that could be converted to gasohol.

Title III of the conference bill would increase the borrowing authority of the Commodity Credit Corporation from $14.5 billion to $25 billion.

Title IV is the original raisin provision of the House bill. It amends the Federal marketing order provisions to authorize market development and research activities for raisins and makes some other minor changes in the law.

The bill the Senate passed on March 21 included a provision to increase the lending limits on real estate and operating loans made under the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act.

It also made family farm corporations and partnerships eligible for such loans.

This is very important and urgently needed legislation. However, both the House and Senate Agriculture Committees recently approved comprehensive farm credit bills that include the provisions of the 1-year emergency bill. The conferees felt it would be better to deal with the credit provisions in the permanent legislation that will be considered by both Houses in the near future.

In working its will, the conference saw fit to eliminate the program that I originally sponsored to pay farmers to divert on a voluntary basis not less than 31 million acres from production of wheat, feed grains, and cotton this year.

It was the consensus of the conference that my cropland diverson proposal was contradictory to the flexible parity approach which had been adopted earlier by the conference.

I was disappointed by this action of a majority of the conference. However, I signed the conference report and urge its adoption by the Senate.

Certainly there are many unanswered questions about the flexible parity concept. But farmers need help now. The time element is critical. And the conference substitute, in my view, is preferable to no bill at all.

There is no question but that an economic crisis exists in rural America. Farmers have been caught between falling prices and skyrocketing production costs.

Many are broke and many others face financial ruin if a solution is not forthcoming.

In January, I urged the President and Secretary of Agriculture to use authority that Congress provided under the 1977 Farm Act to pay producers to take unneeded cropland out of production this year. The failure of the administration to take timely and effective action made it necessary for Congress to act.

The legislation I proposed would have directed the Secretary of Agriculture to implement a paid land diversion program.

My bill provided a workable, practical, effective, and immediate means for dealing with the farm crisis.

My bill would have had a far less inflationary impact than the flexible parity approach.

I do not think it would have faced the veto threat that the conference bill faces.

My bill would have stimulated higher prices for farm products in the marketplace.

It would have brought the huge, price-depressing surpluses down to manageable levels.

It would have put hard cash in farmers' pockets now.

It would be the most cost-effective approach to the farm problem and actually would have saved $90 million in present program costs.

The substitute bill is not everything that all members of the conference wanted. But it is the only feasible legislative means that is now available to Congress to help farmers.

The hour is late. Time is of the essence. Crops are already in the ground and up in many sections. Planting will have been completed throughout the Southeast and Southwest within a matter of days and will be underway throughout the country in a few weeks.

There is no reason for further debate now on the merits of the Talmadge land diversion bill as opposed to the Dole flexible parity bill. A majority of the conference decided that question as far as this legislation is concerned last week.

As much as I might regret that decision, as much as I might fear that it will mean no emergency farm bill at all, I intend to support and work for the conference substitute.

I gather that the President apparently intends to veto the conference bill if and when it reaches him.

I have not had an opportunity to discuss the matter with the President, but I hope that his mind is not closed on the subject.

I urge the Senate to adopt the conference report, and I hope the House will do likewise. I hope the President will reconsider his decision—if, indeed, he has made the decision—to veto the bill.

Farmers need help.

They need help now.

As one Member of this Senate, I intend to do everything within my power to try to provide them that help.

Mr. President, I see the distinguished Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Budget Committee, is now on the floor. I withheld asking unanimous consent to waive the budget provisions. Does the distinguished Senator intend to make a point of order on the conference report?

Mr. MUSKIE. That depends on what the Senator from Georgia does. He certainly has that option. If the question is not raised in any other way by the Senator from Georgia, I intend to——

Mr. TALMADGE. If the Senator will not raise a point of order, I shall not move to waive. If the Senator intends to make a point of order on the conference report, I intend to move to suspend the budget provision.

Mr. MUSKIE. Well, I think the issue ought to be raised, I say to my good friend, because what is at stake is not only the merits of the bill, but whether or not the Senate is disposed to meet its commitment to the budget process or suspend it when it becomes uncomfortable. I think the procedural issue needs to be raised. I did not raise it at the time the Senate bill was under consideration because of the pressure of the time, because I was willing to get to the substance. But now, we have reached the point, the conference having acted, that the substance of the bill is such a serious question under the Budget Act that I think we need also to consider the procedural issues.

So I will raise the point of order unless the Senator raises the issue the way he suggested. Maybe we both will make our point.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, in accordance with section 904(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, I move that section 303(a) of that act be suspended with respect to the consideration of the conference report on H.R. 6782.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion. The motion is debatable.

Who yields time?

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MUSKIE. I understand that under the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement, no vote will take place until the hour of 11 a.m.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MUSKIE. Does that apply to the motion just made by the distinguished floor manager of the bill?

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. MUSKIE. I am prepared to debate the issue and I shall also debate the point of order question so that the Senator's motion will be understood in its full implications. It is immaterial to me whether the issue is resolved under a motion to suspend, which, to me, is more horrendous from the point of view of the Budget Act than a motion made under the provisions of the Budget Act. The Senator from Georgia is proposing to suspend the act when there are procedural options available under the Budget Act to reach the same point. I am perfectly willing to debate the issue on either ground.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry: As I understand the situation now, there will be two votes, the first one to occur at 11 o'clock on the motion I just made to suspend the provisions of the Budget Act, to be followed immediately thereafter, if my motion prevails, by a vote on the conference report. Am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK). The Senator is correct.

Mr. MUSKIE. A parliamentary inquiry: The Senator from Georgia has now made his motion, I understand.

Mr. TALMADGE. I have.

Mr. MUSKIE. May I ask the Parliamentarian what, then, would be the status of the point of order under section 303 if I should raise it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's point of order would not be in order until after a vote on the motion of the Senator from Georgia. If the motion carries, the point of order would not be in order.

Mr. MUSKIE. As I understand it, it is not a question for the Parliamentarian, because it is not really a parliamentary question. A motion to suspend has been made in order to avoid the point of order; so that, in the debate on the motion to suspend, I shall discuss the issue in terms of the point of order in order that, if the Senator's motion is defeated, there may then be a motion on the point of order.

May I ask this of the Parliamentarian: If I should make the point of order in the course of the next 2 hours and the motion of the Senator from Georgia fails, will a vote then occur, or would a ruling be made at that point on my point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct; the Chair will rule at that time.

Mr. MUSKIE. I can make the point of order in advance of that time in order to have it in front of the Chair at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, the point of order will not be in order until the motion of the Senator from Georgia is disposed of.

Mr. MUSKIE. A parliamentary inquiry: Under the unanimous-consent request, I take it that the votes must follow back to back. Will there be an opportunity, following the vote on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, to make the point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There would be such an opportunity.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Kansas, a member of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

Mr. HODGES. Will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request before he begins?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. HODGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Rhona Weaver and Steve Moore of my staff be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration of and vote on H.R. 6782.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MUSKIE. Will the Senator yield for a similar request?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following members of the Budget Committee staff be granted the privilege of the floor during consideration of and votes on the conference report on H.R. 6782: John McEvoy, Karen Williams, Van Ooms, Dan Twomey, Lewis Schuster, and Jacques Cook.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for the same purpose, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Owen Donley, of my staff, be granted privilege of the floor during all procedures and the vote today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia has fairly well stated the case and given us the highlights of the conference report now before the Senate.

There is no doubt in this Senator's mind that there probably are a number of good alternatives we could be considering today. Certainly, the initiative by the distinguished Senator from Georgia, our chairman, is one of those, as is the initiative by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, which, in fact, is incorporated in the conference report by virtue of the Foley amendment which was, in fact, the McGovern amendment when it was considered on the Senate side.

But at this point, the Senator from Kansas would like to address what I consider may be the highlight of what will happen.

This could be doomsday for the American farmer, and that is how it is being advertised by the administration. Already, the halls are filled with lobbyists from the White House trying to shoot down this bill in the Senate.

We have had veteran employees spending thousands of dollars and their time on the Budget Committee trying to figure out the worst possible cases and how much such cases would cost. I do not know how many hours were spent to dream up these worst possible conditions.

We have had statements from the great farm journals the Washington Post, the New York Times, the Wall Street Journal, decrying the cost of the program. I doubt they have even considered the cost themselves but rather have just taken the word from the Budget Committee or the Congressional Budget Office or the USDA.

So today we have probably thousands of farmers in Washington, not because they want to be here, but because their very livelihood is at stake.

They do not have all the calculators, computers, and bureaucrats to figure up the cost of the bill. So they have had to do what they consider to be a proper effort, and that is contacting Members of Congress.

Let us not kid anybody in this Chamber. The best way to scare off urban Members of Congress is to put a $5 billion price tag on a farm bill, and that is just what has happened.

Mr. MUSKIE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. Not right now. I am in the midst of my opening statement.

Mr. MUSKIE. Well, to give the Senator some further basis, enlarging on the point he is making.

Mr. DOLE. I believe we will have a chance to do that later.

But CBO estimates our cost for this bill at $5.3 billion. That ought to scare most anyone. It scares a lot of farmers because they are consumers, too.

What they have done is indicate that everybody is going to participate to the maximum to get that figure, going to participate at the 50-percent set-aside level, disregard the payment limitation which is still part of the law, and they assume that prices will be very low.

So it is the worst possible case to get the highest possible price tag. I think it is rather tragic.

If we use just the moderate figures, or 35 percent participation, and take into account the payment limitation and assume that farmers will get an average price at least equivalent to current prices, because they will set aside some of their production, the cost will be reduced to about $2 billion—$2 billion.

Now, what does the administration say they are willing to do? Nothing, except raise the target prices for wheat from $3.10, under certain conditions, to $3.40.

They will do nothing for feed grains. They will do nothing for cotton.

So I just suggest we ought to start the debate on the right foot. We are not arguing the merits of the program. We will never consider that in the next 2 hours.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. DOLE. Two additional minutes.

We will never consider the plight of the farmer in the next 2 hours. We will talk about the cost, trying to scare certain Senators on this floor, that we cannot vote for this because it will cost so many billions of dollars.

I just think the American farmers gathered today by the hundreds and thousands in Washington should understand how the process works.

We have been told it is a cruel hoax by some in this Chamber opposed to the bill. Are they opposed to helping farmers?

I think the record should be made very clear. The administration through the President said, "We will veto everything except the 30-cent rise in the target price for wheat."

So it makes no difference whether it is flexible parity now on the floor, or the Talmadge land retirement, or some other modification. The President says, "I will veto everything."

I think it is unfortunate the farm bill comes just a day before the President is about to make an inflation statement. Why not single out the American farmer and make him the whipping boy for inflation? And the probable answer tomorrow, "I will veto the farm bill if we can't defeat it in the Senate or if it can't be defeated in the House."

Mr. President, I just want the record to show there will be very little attention paid to the merits of the bill. All the time and focus will be scare tactics, based on the cost of the program. We will probably hear statements saying that we will run out of wheat, cotton and corn, everything that might frighten the American people and frighten the American consumer.

This Senator thinks that is the wrong way to go.

We worked week after week after week, under the leadership of the distinguished chairman (Mr. TALMADGE), who has done more for farmers than anybody I know in this city, and finally we have come to grips with the problem.

I hope sometime in the next 2 hours we will take 30 seconds to discuss the merits.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to me dated April 10 from James C. Webster, Acting Director, Department of Agriculture, Office of Government Affairs.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 10, 1978.

Hon. HERMAN E. TALMADGE,
Chairman, Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In compliance with our commitment to you at the April 4 session of the Senate/House Conferees on H.R. 6782, we are enclosing a copy of the directive providing authority for county ASC committees to adjust 1977-crop acreages of feed grains, cotton, and wheat in cases where individual producers were prevented from planting acreages of such crops in 1977.

Sincerely,

JAMES C. WEBSTER,
Acting Director.

[From the U.S. Department of Agriculture]
FOR ALL STATES AND COUNTIES (EXCEPT HAWAII)

1977 RECORDED ACREAGE

Approved by: Acting Deputy Administrator, State and County Operations.

1. Background:

Procedure in subparagraph 139C, 5–PA, now provides for recording without adjustment in the 1977 planted acreage of feed grains, upland cotton and wheat on ASCS–156, including volunteer acreage harvested for grain but excluding acreage reported as planted and used specifically for cover or green manure. The restriction on adjustments is being changed.

2. Change:

A. Increase the recorded 1977 cotton acreage to the extent that a change from cotton skip row in 1977 to solid planting resulted in an NCA increase authorized in subparagraph 31A5, 5–PA.

B. Increase the recorded 1977 cotton acreage to the extent 1977 prevented planting for cotton was approved for payment.

C. The recorded 1977 acreage of a feed grain or wheat crop may be increased for a significant acreage prevented from planting in 1977 under the following conditions:

1. A prevented planting claim for a significant acreage is filed on ASCS–574–1. Publicize in the fastest and most effective manner that such credit for 1977 prevented planting may be requested.

2. If an ASCS–574–1 is already on file for the farm and crop for 1977, credit may be given for the acreage recorded on the farm which was approved by the COC and STC representative. This acreage may exceed the acreage for which a prevented planting payment was made in cases where payment was limited by the 1977 allotment.

3. For new ASCS–574–1's filed, record and document all available information needed to make a COC determination. Limit approvals to the acreage that was not planted to the crop solely because of a condition beyond the producer's control.

4. All adjustments shall be approved by STC representative.

3. Effect of 1977 increase:

A. Will be used to determine eligibility for 1978 deficiency payments on all acreage planted for harvest.

B. May increase the maximum feed grain and upland cotton acreage for 1978 voluntary diversion purposes.

C. Shall NOT increase the farm NCA.

D. Shall NOT increase the acreage eligible for 1977 prevented planting payment or change 1977 deficiency payments.

E. Shall NOT affect feed grain and wheat yields established for 1978.

4. Effect of 1978 prevented planting:

Credit prevented planting approved for 1978 in the same manner as for 1977. No voluntary diversion payment will be made for prevented planted acreage.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN).

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished chairman, the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) for yielding to me.

Mr. President, I endorse this conference report on H.R. 6782. the emergency farm bill of 1978, and urge its approval by the Senate today.

Respectfully, I must take exception to critics who have charged that this legislation was hastily drafted in an atmosphere of emotion and confusion. The record will show, Mr. President, that this legislation is the result of more than 10 days of extensive hearings—from February 23 through March 10—by the Senate Committee on Agriculture when more than 150 witnesses from the agricultural sector presented their views and recommendations to us. The record further shows that the committee spent 2 days in business sessions marking up this emergency legislation.

Furthermore, the record will show that this emergency legislation was debated on the floor of the Senate for more than 6 hours on March 21, and that the conference committee spent the better part of 2 days in resolving the differences prior to agreeing on this report. I must add that during the time I served as a conferee I saw no emotional instability or emotional outbursts from my fellow conferees.

While to some it may appear this legislation was hammered out in haste, to our farmers and their families who have stood by anxiously awaiting our action it must have seemed a painfully slow and agonizing process.

The late President Franklin D. Roosevelt once said:

> The test of our progress is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much; it is whether we provide enough for those that have too little.

If that is the test with respect to the economic well-being of our farmers, Mr. President, we have failed. USDA itself, in releasing figures as to the farmer's share of the consumer's food dollar, reveals that the farmer receives 31 cents out of every food dollar today compared to 32 cents in 1967. That is 1 cent less out of the food dollar today than 10 years ago, a 3-percent decline from 1967 through 1977. With the ever-increasing cost of necessary inputs, it is no wonder that our farm economy is in such dire straits.

That an emergency in the agricultural sector exists cannot be denied. An emergency existed in January when the farmers first visited us. That same emergency exists now, only a more serious one. While we have worked at legislation, while the administration stonewalled the pleas of our chairman and the committee to implement the authority given them in the 1977 farm bill, the situation grew steadily worse. Time has run out, now. Once again the farmers are caught in the middle. If this conference report is defeated, they are the ones who will suffer. It is planting time right now, bank notes are due, creditors are demanding payment, and here we sit actually debating whether we shall approve this report.

As I see it, our purpose here is to restore the farm economy, not wreck it. We are toying with the future of many of our young farmers here today. If we do not act and act quickly many of them tell me they are finished. I am speaking of young farmers just out of college with degrees in agricultural economics, husbandry, and agronomy. Some of Alabama's young farmers, hard hit by last summer's drought, are unable to get loans from SBA or FmHA because they have no previous record in farming. If there is anything our agriculture sector sorely needs over and above the emergency assistance we propose to give them at this time, it is the infusion of young, intelligent, well educated, aggressive, and dedicated farmers into it. But young men and women will not be enticed into farming if there is no incentive to farm.

As usual, the scare tactics along with one-sided editorials and cost estimates have been unleashed against this legislation. They have been joined by the alarmists who predict food scarcity at home and abroad. They have neglected to say that this is only a 1-year bill designed to give immediate and temporary relief. This is no multiyear bill. True, its payments will spill over into fiscal year 1979. But the Senate Committee on Agriculture, knowing that some type of emergency farm legislation would reach the floor during this session, recommended in its budget review session on March 8, that $6 billion be added to the agricultural sector of the fiscal year 1979 budget to cover any emergency legislation which might be passed. Mr. President, we envisioned emergency help for our farmers. We did not act precipitously or irresponsibly.

Yes it will cost as does any emergency relief act. It will cost the Treasury and it will cost the consumer. Estimates run from 2 billion up as to what it may cost the Federal Government. If prices of agriculture commodities increase as they should, there is the possibility it may cost the Government nothing in deficiency payments. It may cost the consumer from 1.5 percent to a 4 percent increase in the cost of food. But to do nothing at this point would prove to be the costliest course of all. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that this legislation may increase the cost of food for a family of four $36 to $46 over a 12-month period. To insure a reliable source of food supply, to assure that the family farm survives and to further assure that agricultural production does not inevitably wind up in the hands of a few corporate farms the increased cost is not unreasonable. We just cannot continue to ask our farmers to sell their crops at prices lower than their cost of production.

Farmers are consumers, too. They buy trucks, tractors, combines, cotton pickers, plows, clothes, stoves, and houses. If the depression currently confined to the farm sector spreads, other sectors of the economy will experience similar depressions. Our current national unemployment rate has just been announced at 6.2 percent; but a continued decline in the farm income will affect steel, autos, equipment manufacture, and agribusiness, and there will be an increase in the number of farmers and farm employees looking for jobs, at a time when unemployment among nonfarmers is just beginning to show improvement.

USDA figures reveal that last year the average income per farm was only $7,885 compared with a peak of $10,529 in 1973. To insure that our farmers continue to produce abundant food and fiber supplies for Americans and the world it is imperative that this legislation become law.

Our basic problem is one of excess supply. We need to bring supply and demand into balance and this flexible parity concept will do it. There are carry-over stocks of 1.2 billion bushels of wheat, 1.1 billion bushels of corn, and 5.8 million bales of cotton. This 1-year bill, allowing the farmer to select the amount of his production and the corresponding target price will help correct the situation. Some have raised fears that such a plan will result in reduced exports. We'll still have plenty to export. Besides, it's not fair to ask a farmer to continue to produce for export if he must sell every bushel and every bale abroad at less than the cost of production.

Other critics of this bill have incorrectly observed that it will concentrate payments in the hands of large farmers to the neglect and exclusion of the small family farmer. Such is just not the case. The payment limitation of $40,000 as provided for in Public Law 95–113 is still in effect. This legislation does not alter that provision one iota.

As usual, there is the customary argument from the bureaucracy that this legislation will be too difficult to administer. The Senator from Alabama has in his tenure in the Senate heard that same argument from every agency in the Federal Government when faced with a progressive and new idea. The bureaucracy is always afraid of anything different for fear it might just work. Even if it proved to be difficult to administer, there are enough career civil servants at USDA without enough to do to provide adequate administration. I learned long ago that when you do not want to do anything, one excuse is as good as another.

Finally, Mr. President, let us once and for all deliver the farmer from a "bum rap." For too long he has been accused of being the cause of inflation. To the contrary, he has been placed in the financial bind he is in because of inflation. Citizens of this country spend a smaller percentage of their income on food than any industrialized country in the world. It is the farmer who has seen the cost of his tractors, farm implements and machinery, fertilizer, seed, feed, fuel, and land double in price while the prices he has received have either remained constant or have declined. When wheat sold in excess of $5 per bushel a few years back there was only about 6 cents worth of wheat in a 1-pound loaf of bread. Now that wheat is down to less than $3 per bushel with only about 3 cents worth of wheat in a 1-pound loaf of bread I have not seen the price of bread decline. No, Mr. President, it is not the farmer who is the cause of inflation. He has been and is the victim of inflation.

It is not fair to require the farmers to be the only economic group in our country which is not allowed to make a profit. If we are going to hold down inflation it must not be done by holding down the farmer.

These provisions in this conference report before us today will remedy the problems of overproduction, excessive carryovers, and depressed prices.

I was one of the original cosponsors of this legislation and a cosigner of this conference report. I urge my distinguished colleagues to vote for it and my friends in the House to approve it. I respectfully request my President to sign it.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, who is an able member of our committee.

Mr. YOUNG. I thank the chairman.

Mr. President, I support approval of the Senate-House conference report on the farm bill.

The conference report as now constituted has, as its major provision, the Dole flexible parity bill. Its provisions are new and unique, and it is obvious that this flexible price support concept is very appealing to a good many farmers, especially grain producers.

If they decide to cut their acreage and reduce production, to reduce our huge price depressing surplus, especially of wheat, they would be paid on the basis of the amount of acreage they take out of production. This is fair and equitable and over the long term would be less costly to the Federal Government.

If the surplus were reduced to a manageable supply, the cash farm price would be more fair and equitable, and without the necessity of continuing subsidy payments.

Mr. President, I cannot help but be concerned by the charges of Secretary of Agriculture Bergland—and even by our Senate Budget Committee staff—that the price to consumers would be sharply increased.

Such statements do not take into account the fact that grain prices have been far below the cost of production for a year or more. They seem to think that farmers should continue to produce at a loss, so that there would be no increase in consumer prices.

The Carter administration seems to be far more concerned about high farm prices than about low farm prices.

The average consumer, I am sure, wants farmers to receive at least the cost of production. This is in the consumer's long-term best interest, as it would enable many farmers, who otherwise would have to quit, to keep on farming—thus assuring consumers of an adequate supply of food and fiber in the future.

Mr. Ray Fitzgerald, administrator of ASCS, when testifying before the Senate Subcommittee on Agriculure Appropriations last week, stated that the carryover of wheat at the end of the marketing year on May 31 is expected to be 1.2 billion bushels.

That is more than twice as much as would be needed for domestic human food consumption this next year. There will be no shortage of wheat, as some have claimed. In fact, there will be a sizable surplus.

The total production of wheat for the past 2 years has been in excess of 2 billion bushels. Even with the present farm program, production will be at least three times our domestic needs.

If this farm bill is vetoed, we undoubtedly will continue to have a price depressing surplus of wheat. The average farm price of wheat is considerably less than claimed by Department of Agriculture officials.

Bismarck, N. Dak., is in the heart of the Hard Red Springs wheat producing area, and the price of a bushel of 15-percent protein wheat there on March 27 was $2.53; on March 28, $2.57; on March 29, $2.50; on March 30, $2.57; and on March 31, $2.57.

This is premium wheat, not low-grade wheat. Since the conference adoption of the Dole bill, prices did rise rather sharply the latter part of last week. They are still far less than the cost of production.

Mr. President, the biggest complaint against this farm bill seems to be its effect on wheat prices and how much it will add to the cost of food to consumers. Actually, the price of wheat has little to do with the price of bread.

The total farm price of wheat in a 1-pound loaf of bread at the end of February of this year was 2.9 cents—which is 1 cent less than a year ago. The price of that loaf of bread is now 36 cents, compared to 35.5 cents a year ago. The price of bread in the past 2 years has increased, while the farm price of wheat is down sharply.

Mr. President, there would be some additional costs to the Government from the Dole flexible parity bill if it becomes law, but these costs would be far less than claimed by the Budget Committee and the Department of Agriculture.

Winter wheat, which comprises about 75 percent of all the wheat production, has long since been planted and has attained good growth. Hard Red Spring wheat will be planted soon. Thus, the total production of wheat, because of the lateness of the Dole bill being passed by Congress going into effect, means there would not be a very sizable participation by farmers and the resultant drop in production.

Thus, the estimated cost by the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the Budget Committee is at least two or three times what the actual costs of this bill would be.

If we do nothing, a great many farmers—and particularly young farmers—will have to leave the farm. The approval of this bill would largely prevent that exodus of farmers. Thus, the effect on our whole economy would be far less than the additional cost which may occur.

Mr. President, I hope this bill will be approved by the Senate and House and signed by the President.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the chairman.

Will the Senator from Maine yield me 2 minutes, in addition?

Mr. MUSKIE. Yes. I am happy to yield 2 minutes.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the farm bill conference report that is to be voted on today, if accepted by the Senate, will face an uncertain future in the House. President Carter's promise to veto it may well pressure the House to reject the bill. If the President's opposition to the bill causes its defeat, I hope that the House will immediately take up the proposal with some amendments that will solve at least part of the agricultural producer's dilemma. It is essential that Congress enact, and the President sign, a bill that improves agricultural commodity prices this spring.

But there are weaknesses in the conference report that water down the loan rates for grains after the Senate passed this bill on March 21. Particularly weakened was the loan rate for wheat, which was reduced from $2.85 to $2.55 per bushel. The loan rate is the basic mechanism in our farm law that protects our agricultural producers by giving them the opportunity for a floor price by Government-backed loans. The loan rates become the floor price in the marketplace to protect grain farmers from even lower prices. In times of surplus it is extremely important that farmers have such floor price protection.

When the bill passed the Senate, an amendment I offered on the floor set the loan rate at $2.85 per bushel of wheat. I would prefer to have it higher. Wheat farmers' average cost of production is over $3 per bushel, but at least raising the loan rates to $2.85 was a 60 cents per bushel increase and a desirable step in the right direction.

This needed improvement is not just important for wheat farmers but also is very important for the country as a whole. We try to sell over a billion bushels of American wheat abroad each year. When we sell American wheat or other grains to other countries at prices below the cost of production, we are selling out too cheap, and it is one of the reasons for deficits in our balance of payments.

I would like to use an example of our sales of wheat to Japan, which is our best regular customer for American wheat. In 1976 we sold Japan 3,311,000 metric tons of wheat for which they paid an average price of $4.29 per bushel totaling $522,294,000. In 1977 we sold them 4 million metric tons more of wheat for an average price of $3.07 totaling $374,490,000. This illustrates one problem we are having with our balance of payments with Japan. They get 4 million more metric tons of wheat from us, but paid us $148,804,000 less.

Consumers live in fear that food prices will rise dramatically. Those fears are not warranty by the facts concerning wheat. When wheat is selling for $2.25 per bushel, there is 2.6 cents worth of wheat in a 1-pound loaf of bread. If wheat is at $2.85 per bushel there would be 3.3 cents worth of wheat in that same 1-pound loaf of bread. And so the modest increases we are looking for in loan rates are not to be feared by consumers.

Wheat farmers have another serious problem with the conference report as presented today. The provisions only cover the 1978 crops and the increased target price would only apply to wheat harvested this year. Then without further legislative action, the target price for next year's crop would be lowered to $3.10. Winter wheat planting for next year's crop will start in September—less than 5 months away—and the wheat farmers will be in a quandary wondering how much winter wheat should be planted faced with that kind of a lowered target price.

There is still much more work to be done on these two points to protect wheat farmers. If this conference report is turned down by the House at the urging of President Carter and the House, then amends the bill and sends it back to the Senate, I shall offer amendments at that time to set an equitable loan rate and target price for 1978 and 1979 wheat crops.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the conference report on H.R. 6782, the Emergency Agriculture Act of 1978.

I wish to commend the able chairman, Mr. TALMADGE; the able ranking Republican member, Mr. DOLE; and other members of the conference committee for recognizing the urgency of the current farm crisis and promptly reporting out this emergency legislation.

I am pleased that the committee has adopted the flexible parity proposal over other land retirement proposals. Flexible parity provides a mechanism under which farmers can collectively control production and under which each individual farmer can select a target price and set-aside that best applies to his farm situation.

I am further pleased that the committee has recognized the need to increase the loan levels for wheat, corn and cotton and has increased the borrowing authority of the Commodity Credit Corporation by $10.5 billion.

I regret that the bill does not contain a provision for soybeans, and sincerely hope that this can be contained in a bill for another year.

There is concern about the effects this bill will have on the budget. I do not think there has been any Member of the Senate who has stood more for economy than the Senator from South Carolina. However, this is a time when we must help the farm segment of our population if they are going to survive.

Mr. President, I ask, is $5.3 billion too high a price to pay to insure the survival of the family farm? I shudder to think what the cost of food and fiber will be when the family farm has disappeared. Our Nation's food and fiber will then be produced on large corporation farms, and the consumer will pay much higher prices if this happens.

Mr. President, is $5.3 billion too high a price to pay when an urban oriented department such as the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare last year misspent between $6.5 billion and $7.5 billion of our taxpayers' money through waste, mismanagement, and fraud. This is equal to $19 million per day. HEW has asked for an identical increase of $7 billion in its upcoming budget.

Mr. President, is $5.3 billion too high a price to pay when the Federal Government can afford to pay $13 million per month during January, February, and March for food stamps to striking coal miners. This is $39 million to workers who voluntarily stayed away from their jobs.

Mr. President, the total net income of United States farmers dropped below $20 billion in 1977, the lowest since 1972. This was 10 percent below the 1976 level. Declining farm product prices have led to renewed appeals for a return to 100 percent parity prices. At the present time farm prices are only 66 percent of parity.

Farm debt, on the other hand, is one of the most accurate barometers of farm distress. Farm debt is on the rise. Farm indebtedness increased rapidly in the past year, rising a record 16 percent. Farm debt now totals nearly $120 billion, twice as much as in 1970.

Farmers may need more credit, but mainly they need better prices.

I think it is in the interest, not only of the farmers, but in the interest of the consumer and in the interest of all the American people, that we take action to help the farmer during this period of crisis. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support the conference report on H.R. 6782.

Mr. President, in closing, I just want to say that I am pleased that the Senate is finally taking action to help our farmers. Their very survival is at stake. I am very proud that action has been taken today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 3 minutes have expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I withhold the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Kansas, my good friend, suggested—maybe the suggestion was not directed to me personally—but he did clearly suggest that there is some objection to the fact that so many farmers from around the country are visiting Washington and are visiting Members of Congress in their offices and in the corridors of the Capitol.

I want to assure the Senator from Kansas I have no such objection. I think they are welcome here. I think maybe it is about time they recognized that this is an opportunity for them to influence the legislative process, and I welcome that even though we may not always agree.

But the distinguished Senator from Kansas made another observation in connection with that one, which I cannot believe he really means. He suggested that, although the farmers are welcome, the members of the Budget Committee, the Congressional Budget Office, and the President of the United States are somehow out of order in undertaking to influence the result of this vote.

I remind the distinguished Senator that I was given a specific charge as chairman of the Budget Committee to enforce this discipline and I will not yield that responsibility simply because a number of Americans who may disagree with my point of view are visiting us in Washington. I want to make that clear.

The second point the distinguished Senator from——

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUSKIE. I would have been happy to engage in this colloquy earlier. Now I wish to finish my side of it, but I will yield in due course.

Another point that the Senator made was that CBO's estimates, the cost, the inflationary impact of this bill are based on worst case analysis. I challenge that, but before I do I point out that the Senator from Kansas himself is engaged in worst case analysis of the position of the Budget Committee, the Congressional Budget Office, and the administration.

I listened to his description of our position, I listened to his description of the President's position, and if I ever heard a worst case analysis, a strawman analysis designed to give him an attractive target to hit, for the purposes of his supporters in the galleries, that was it. I did not recognize it, and I doubt that the President would.

So now I wish to get to the merits of this issue and the procedural questions that are involved.

Some of this I hope may be of interest to citizens in the gallery who are concerned about the state of this country's economy not only from the point of view of their own livelihoods but from the point of view of the economy as a whole because it is that with which I am charged. The Budget Committee is not the Agriculture Committee. The Budget Committee has been created to exercise discipline with respect to the whole $500 billion of Government spending which can come from only one place, the taxpayers' pockets. My friends in the galleries are taxpayers as well as farmers.

That is our responsibility and it is our responsibility to give the Senate our best judgment even when that best judgment runs counter to the popular tide of a current popular issue.

If the Budget Committee were to bend with the wind every time the wind from the grassroots says, "Senator, we need more money," there would be no budget process. There would be no restraint on spending. And instead of a $500 billion outlays ceiling for the next year we would have something closer to $530, $540 billion.

If there is any doubt on the part of anyone in the gallery on that point, I would be glad to give them as much exposure as they need to the pressures that are brought upon the Budget Committee to provide more money, more money, for this, that, or the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. MUSKIE. I yield 5 additional minutes.

Mr. President, President Carter has advised us that if Congress passes this conference report he will veto it. My good friend from Kansas has said, "Does the President not care at all about farmers?" He has said he will veto it because it could drive food price inflation to double digit levels and add as much as $6 billion to our Federal deficit. My good friend from Kansas challenges that $6 billion figure as being an inflated worst case figure.

I remind my good friend from Kansas that that number is supported by our own Congressional Budget Office which was created to give us independent analyses, the CBO's analysis is based upon a projection of normal weather, not worst case weather, normal weather.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. MUSKIE. I would like to finish.

Mr. DOLE. I just wanted the Senator to tell us how he got that figure.

Mr. MUSKIE. I would be glad to provide that analysis from CBO, but I cannot do it within the constraints of the time I want to devote to this particular part of the debate. But that figure was produced by the CBO in the same way CBO produces every figure that the Budget Committee and the Congress use to reach judgments independent of that of the President and the executive branch to keep spending under control.

If we are willing to trust CBO's judgment and capability and objectivity for $500 billion of spending surely their judgment is equally objective and sound when it relates to a program in which a particular Senator may be interested at a particular moment in time.

What do we do? Bring in a new estimating authority whenever our own authority somehow does not fit our personal desires or our personal wishes? Obviously, that is not the road to budgetary discipline.

Mr. President, the President also said that this conference report will damage our livestock industry by sharply increasing seed prices.

That sort of thing has happened before, Mr. President. This is not a new perspective or perception of the interrelationship of feedgrain prices and cattle-raising costs. This is the warning flag. It has happened within the last 3 or 4 years. The President says it could happen again under this conference report.

The President said it will undermine our competitive position in world agricultural markets. Is that in the farmers' interest, if true? If the President and his experts believe it to be true, if CBO believes it to be true, is that a warning that ought to be ignored not only by the rest of us but by American farmers?

Finally, Mr. President, the farmers will get no help from a bill that the President vetoes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President's letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., April 6, 1978.

To Senator EDMUND MUSKIE:

Sixteen months ago, I asked Bob Bergland to join with the Congress to help restore a sense of direction and purpose to the farm and food policies of this nation. The extreme volatility of farm and food prices of recent years has not been in the best interest of either our Nation's farmers or consumers.

When we took office, farm income was in sharp decline. We undertook to reverse this trend and return stability to the nation's farm economy. Working with you and other members of the Congress, we developed the most sweeping farm legislation of the past 40 years. Using the authorities of that law, we have moved to improve the incomes of America's farmers.

This policy is working. Our agricultural economy has improved markedly in recent months. To further strengthen this recovery, we announced last week:

An expansion and liberalization of the farmer-held grain reserve.

Paid diversion of 7 to 9 million acres of excess cropland.

And other steps which, in combination with the reserve and the acreage diversion, will add up to $4 billion to crop producer income.

These are carefully considered measures. They will provide decent farm incomes, protect consumers from precipitous price rises, enhance our reliability as a major agricultural exporter, and allow us to meet our humanitarian food aid commitments.

Yesterday a conference committee of the Congress reported H.R. 6782, legislation that was hastily drafted in an atmosphere of emotion and confusion. Should that legislation reach my desk, it will be vetoed.

No one who understands our farm economy should be deceived about the impacts of this measure.

It would increase food price inflation to double digit levels.

It would add as much as $6 billion to the Federal budget.

By sharply reducing production and increasing prices, this bill could seriously undermine our competitive position in world markets.

The higher feed prices that result would adversely affect our own livestock industry.

It would require vast new layers of bureaucracy to administer the complicated and confusing schedule of eligibility requirements and payments.

And, this bill would direct the vast majority of its benefits to a small number of the very largest of our farmers, rather than those in greatest need of help.

This Administration is committed to a strong and prosperous farm economy and one that is able to compete successfully in international markets. We now have a policy to accomplish this objective. I call upon you and other members of Congress to join with me in supporting this policy and in defeating this conference committee bill.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be included in the RECORD following his letter a Department of Agriculture briefing paper dated April 3, 1978, which describes the President's nine-point program to deal with this issue. I do this in answer to the Senator from Kansas' suggestion that the President does not care.

There being no objection, the briefing paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW FEATURES OF FEDERAL FARM PROGRAMS

BACKGROUND

The world has harvested two consecutive large crops. U.S. farmers have harvested three.

Declining commodity prices and farm incomes in 1977 were the result of large worldwide supplies of grains, oilseeds, and fibers and an increasingly large proportion of stocks accumulated in the United States. Liquidation of the domestic cattle herd because of unprofitable feeding and poor pasture conditions caused by drought also took their toll.

Realized net farm income in 1977 declined to $20 billion—in real terms, equivalent to 1971. The result of this overall situation was severe cash-flow and debt-repayment problems for many farmers. The severity of these problems varied greatly by commodity and by region of the country.

Realized net farm income for the first half of 1978 is at an annual rate of $23 billion, or about $3 billion higher than last year. Foreign demand for the major crops points to a record volume of agricultural exports in the current marketing year.

RECENT MARKET DEVELOPMENTS

Most commodity prices have shown appreciable increases in recent months from earlier lows:

Wheat at Kansas City from $2.30 last June to $3.20 now;

Corn at Chicago from the fall low of $1.80 to $2.43;

Cotton at Memphis from 48 cents at the turn of the year to 56 cents;

Soybeans at Chicago from $5.50 in October to near $7.00;

Rice from $6.87 at mid-year to $11.40 in February;

Choice steers at Omaha from $37 last spring to over $50;

Hogs from $36 last April to $48 now.

Even though commodity prices have shown these increases because of the farmer-held reserve, improved export markets (particularly for oilseeds), increased livestock returns, and some improvement in general economic conditions, some farmers still are experiencing severe problems.

ADMINISTRATION INITIATIVES

On March 29, 1978, The Vice President and the Secretary of Agriculture announced nine major actions with the objectives of dealing with these problems, further strengthening farm income, and continuing the steady growth in agriculture:

1. To ensure better crop prices and thwart runaway food price inflation caused by the weather, the farmer-owned reserve is being expanded and the terms liberalized. Grain placed in reserve will not be subject to interest charges after the first year. The reserve programs will be used to remove excess 1978 crop production.

2. To take excess 1977-crop corn and grain sorghum off the market, both crops can be put into the reserve program starting May 1.

3. To ensure that the United States can meet its food aid commitments in times of short supply and to support market prices, the government will purchase wheat in the market to build an emergency reserve of 220 million bushels, including wheat accumulated from CCC loan forfeitures.

4. To adjust wheat production downward, producers who participate in the 20 percent set-aside may graze out their wheat or harvest hay on up to 40 percent or 50 acres (whichever is larger) of the total acreage of barley, corn, grain sorghum, upland cotton, and wheat intended for harvest in 1978, and receive a payment of 50 cents a bushel or the wheat deficiency payment rate, whichever is higher.

5. To bring feed grain production in line with potential demand, producers who participate in the feed grain set-aside may divert additional acreage equal to 10 percent of acres planted to the crop and receive a payment of 20 cents per bushel for corn or 12 cents per bushel for sorghum or barley on the normal production from planted acres.

6. To adjust cotton production down, producers may divert acreage equal to 10 percent of the acres planted in return for a payment of 2 cents per pound on the normal production from the planted acres.

7. To balance soybean loans with competing crops, the loan for 1978-crop soybeans is being established at $4.50 a bushel, up $1.00 per bushel over the 1977 loan.

8. To compensate for increases in costs, loan and target prices for 1978-crop rice will be increased, according to law. Preliminary data indicates a loan of $6.40 per cwt. and a target price of $8.53 per cwt. There will not be a set-aside program for the 1978 crop.

9. To improve credit access for farmers and ranchers with serious debt-repayment problems, we are urging the Congress to pass our proposals for an Economic Emergency Loan Program.

IMPACT OF INITIATIVES

The reserve gives producers the opportunity to hold their crops off the market at low cost to await higher market prices, protect consumers and livestock producers against severe price increases in the event of a poor harvest, and ensure our credibility as a reliable supplier of farm products.

The diversion and grazing payments will:

Provide additional economic incentives for participation in the farm programs;

Give immediate cash assistance and potentially provide crop producers a $3–4 billion increase in net returns;

Strengthen market prices by bringing supplies into better balance with demand; and

Conserve energy and natural resources; while providing an accessible land reserve for use when needed.

GRAZING AND HAY PROGRAM

Section 1004 of the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 authorizes the Secretary to administer a special wheat acreage grazing and hay program.

A producer who decides to participate must designate the specific acreage on the farm that is to be used for grazing or hay (cut immature for green chop, hay or silage). Acreage included in this program must be in addition to set-aside acres and be within the normal crop acres of the farm.

The payment rate will be at least 50 cents a bushel or the deficiency payment rate, whichever is greater. The total payment will be determined by multiplying the established farm wheat yield, times the number of acres in the program, times the payment rate.

Producers will receive a 25 cent per bushel payment at signup.

This initiative is expected to result in an additional 1 to 1.5 million acres being grazed or hayed, with a 30–50 million bushel reduction in 1978 production from current estimates.

Wheat prices will likely be slightly higher (3–5 cents) and net budget outlays will be slightly lower because of a reduction in deficiency payments and loan and inventory outlays.

FEED GRAIN DIVERSION PROGRAM

Section 502 of the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 authorizes the Secretary to make land diversion payments to producers to adjust the national acreage of feed grains to desirable goals.

The 10 percent voluntary land diversion program for feed grains is in addition to the 10 percent set-aside for feed grains.

To receive diversion payments, producers' 1978 plantings cannot exceed 1977 plantings for each of the crops, or exceed the normal crop acres for the farm. The diverted land must also be put into an approved conservation use.

The payment rates for the voluntary diversion of feed grains are: 20 cents per bushel for corn and 12 cents per bushel for barley and grain sorghum. The payment will be determined by multiplying the payment rate times the established crop yields for the farm, times the 1978 acres planted for harvest.

At signup, producers will receive an advance payment of 10 cents per bushel for corn or 6 cents per bushel for sorghum or barley.

Estimates are that 10 million acres will be placed in set-aside or land diversion. Approximately 7 million acres will be corn, 1.5 to 2 million acres will be grain sorghum, and 1 to 1.5 million acres will be barley. Six of the 10 million acres will be in set-aside; four will be in land diversion.

The impact of this diversion program will be to reduce feed grains by 5 to 7 million acres from current estimates with a 4–6 million acre reduction in corn and a 1 to 2 million acre reduction in soybeans.

Feed grain stocks are expected to be reduced about 335 to 450 million bushels (corn equivalent) over current estimates. Diversion payments for this program will likely total about $625 million: $540 million for corn, $50 million for grain sorghum, and $35 million for barley.

Corn prices for 1978 are expected to strengthen 15–25 cents a bushel from current estimates, with increases to other feed grains in relation to corn.

Net government outlays are expected to be minimal because of a reduction in deficiency payments and loans and inventory outlays.

COTTON DIVERSION PROGRAM

Section 602 of the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 authorizes the Secretary to implement a paid diversion program for 1978-crop upland cotton.

Participants would divert cropland equal to 10 percent of the 1978 planted cotton acreage and also limit 1978 cotton plantings to not more than 1977 cotton plantings. The payment will be determined by multiplying the 2 cents per pound rate times the farm yield times the cotton acreage planted for harvest; producers will receive a 1 cent/lb. advance at signup.

Planted acreage is expected to be reduced 500,000 to 1 million acres from current estimates with no diversion.

Farm prices will likely increase about 3 cents per pound; net returns would be increased $50–60 million. Consumer prices of goods made from cotton will be slightly higher as a result of slightly higher cotton prices; the price of a $15 cotton shirt would go up about 9 cents.

Diversion payments will likely total $100 million, and be offset by a reduction in deficiency payments and loan and inventory costs.

EXAMPLES OF PAYMENTS

For Wheat:

Assumptions: A farmer has 300 acres of wheat and will graze all of it and also plant cotton and sorghum. The normal crop acreage (NCA) is 1,000 acres. The farm yields are: 30 bu./acre (wheat), 500 lb./acre (cotton), and 40 bu./acre (sorghum). Also 1978 planted acreage will not exceed 1977 acreage.

EXAMPLE

	Acres
Wheat to be grazed out	300
Required set-aside (20 percent)	60
1978 planting intentions for cotton	300
Diversion required (10 percent)	30
1978 planting intentions for sorghum	250
Required set-aside (10 percent)	25
Diversion required (10 percent)	25
Balance to other NCA crops	10
Total	1,000

The payment for the 300 acres grazed out is: 30 bu./acre × 50 cents/bu. × 300 = $4,500.

The payment for the cotton diversion is: 500 lb./acre × 2 cents/lb. × 300 = $3,000.

The payment for the sorghum diversion is: 40 bu./acre × 12 cents/bu. × 250 = $1,200.

NOTE.—The farmer can graze out all of his wheat because it is not more than 40 percent of his NCA total of 1,000 acres.

For Feed Grains:

Assumptions: A farmer has a normal crop acreage (NCA) of 400 acres. He decides to plant 100 acres of corn this year. His 1977 planted corn acreage was 105 acres. His farm yield for corn is 100 bushels per acre.

Remember that 1978 planted acreage cannot exceed 1977 planted acreage in order to obtain the diversion payment.

EXAMPLE

	Acres
1978 planting intentions for corn	100
Required set-aside (10 percent)	10
Voluntary diversion (10 percent)	10
Acreage that can be planted to other NCA crops	280
Total	400

The payment in this example is: 20 cents/bu. × 100 bu./acre × 100 acres = $2,000.

For Cotton:

Assumption: A farmer has a normal crop acreage (NCA) of 500 acres. He is planting 100 acres of cotton this year. His 1977 planted cotton acreage was 100 acres. His farm yield for cotton is 500 pounds per acre.

Remmeber that 1978 planted acreage cannot exceed 1977 planted acreage in order to obtain the diversion payment.

EXAMPLE

	Acres
Cotton planting intentions for 1978	100
Required set-aside	0
Voluntary diversion (10 percent)	10
Acreage that can be planted to other NCA crops	390
Total	500

The payment in this example is: 2 cents/lb. × 500 lb./acre × 100 acres = $1,000.

Mr. MUSKIE. He may disagree with the program, but the fact that the President does not care is another point entirely.

Mr. President, the Senate must meet its responsibility to return this bill to conference in order to produce a bill which meets the farmers' needs with minimum possible cost in increased inflation, deficit, and grain shortages.

At this point I would like to make some parliamentary inquiries to put in perspective a parliamentary issue the Senate in one way or another will have to resolve today.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, at the appropriate time will the Senator ask for an additional time to yield so we can have a little colloquy on some of the points he is raising about the impact of this bill on the budget, on the Federal deficit, and also on consumers, the issues that he raised here this morning, and also in his letter to Members of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. MUSKIE. You see what the time problem is, may I say to the Senator. I will be glad to try to engage in as extensive a discussion as my hour time limit permits.

Mr. McGOVERN. Maybe 5 or 6 minutes.

Mr. MUSKIE. I do have some priorities that relate to that time concerning my responsibility as Budget Committee chairman.

Second, I am not an agricultural expert so I am not in the same position as the Senator from South Dakota is, perhaps, in discussing some of the substantive questions.

Mr. McGOVERN. It is really the budget matters I wanted to discuss. That is why I asked the Senator to request additional time.

Mr. MUSKIE. I cannot promise the Senator. I have made some commitments as to time, but I will do the best I can.

Mr. President, with respect to the parliamentary inquiries: Is it not true that conference reports such as the pending legislation are amendments and, therefore, subject to the procedures of section 303 of the Budget Act?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state the parliamentary inquiry again, please?

Mr. MUSKIE. Is it not true that conference reports such as this one are amendments and, therefore, subject to the procedures of section 303 of the Budget Act?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator say is it not true that they are amendable——

Mr. MUSKIE. That they are subject to the procedures of section 303 of the Budget Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. Section 303 has been interpreted to include amendments made in conference that contain new matter not previously considered by the Senate.

Mr. MUSKIE. The second inquiry: Is it not true that this conference report provides new spending authority within the meaning of section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Budget Act which is to become effective on October 1, 1978? I understand these questions were reviewed with the Parliamentarian earlier so that we will not be springing any surprises on him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would have to examine the conference report in order to answer the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MUSKIE. Well, I guess I have been misinformed as to the scope and thoroughness of the prior review. I will pass over this matter for the moment while counsel for the committee consults with the Parliamentarian so that we will not waste my hour. I understand it had been thoroughly reviewed.

But instead of putting parliamentary inquiries at this point I will make the point, which I hope to reinforce later with a ruling from the Parliamentarian, so that we can proceed. I do not want to use an hour debating this technical question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The answer is yes to the second parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MUSKIE. The answer is yes.

Now, third, is it not true that under section 303(a) of the Budget Act this legislation, on the basis of the two previous answers, cannot be considered until after the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979 is adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. MUSKIE. So that if that answer is correct, this conference report, since it is pending before the Senate prior to the adoption of the first concurrent resolution for 1979, is subject to a point of order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MUSKIE. I thank the Chair and the Parliamentarian. Mr. President, I will now comment upon the answers I have received.

It is not difficult to understand why this provision, section 303, was inserted in the Budget Act. That provision says that when we are dealing with the next budget year all spending decisions are to be considered together in the first concurrent budget resolution so that when we begin to authorize spending for the next budget year we do so having in mind all of the spending pressures and demands we are being asked to consider.

What we are being asked to do here is to give preference to this particular bill and this particular proposal over all others, $500 billion worth of them, which the Budget Committee is at the present time considering, with a view to reporting first concurrent budget resolution to the Senate on April 15. That is the point.

Once we abandon it, and especially if we abandon it in the way that Senator TALMADGE proposes, to suspend the Budget Act altogether, to suspend it altogether, what we are saying is we do not even care about the procedures.

There was a procedure available to the conference to deal with section 303. They could have applied to the Budget Committee for a waiver of section 303, and that could have been done last week. But, no, the Agriculture Committee and the conferees find that too inconvenient. They have not asked for a waiver, they have not asked the Budget Committee for a waiver.

They have not tried to make a case in the Budget Committee for a waiver, but instead they come here and say, "That Budget Act is too inconvenient, so I am going to move," the distinguished floor manager says, "to suspend the Budget Act."

Well, if we are going to suspend the Budget Act every time it is inconvenient, every time it is uncomfortable, every time it stands in the way, every time it requires us to follow a certain procedure to assure that the provisions of the act are safeguarded, then it becomes meaningless. If at some time, then, our friends in the gallery are concerned about another form of Government spending, and they say, "Why do not the Budget Committee and the Congress stop that," how are we going to stop it if we have already undermined the procedures for controlling and disciplining Government spending? How are we going to stop it? Do you think we can turn it on and off like a faucet of water?

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MUSKIE. Not yet. How are you going to observe a procedure if you get rid of it, throw it away, suspend it every time it becomes inconvenient?

So, Mr. President, it is not difficult to understand why this provision was inserted in the Budget Act. As reported from conference, the bill carries an October 1, 1978, effective date. It contains fiscal year 1979 farm entitlement provisions, which are to be considered before the Budget Committee has had an opportunity to establish national spending priorities in our first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979. It is therefore subject to a point of order under section 303(a), and because the floor manager of the bill understands that, he wants to avoid the point of order by moving to suspend the Budget Act.

Mr. President, this bill fails to comply with the requirements of the Budget Act, and disregards orderly budget procedures. That means that the Budget Committee is forced to draw up its resolution under pressure to include a specific program, without retaining the responsibility to establish spending priorities for fiscal year 1979.

It would appear, Mr. President, that if this bill indeed exists in circumstances that are extraordinary, the Budget Act, by providing a waiver procedure, anticipates the abiilty to respond to extraordinary and unanticipated emergencies. But, no, we do not use the waiver. We do not use the procedure. We just push the Budget Act to one side, and then do what we will.

That is the way we used to operate, and it looks to me as though that is the way we are going to continue to operate in the future, if we have more precedents like the one before us in the Senate today.

Mr. President, if the budget process is not strong enough to moderate constituent pressures and focus congressional deliberation on the Nation's problems in an orderly and deliberate way, then the budget process is not worth the paper on which it is written. If the budget process is only to total the interest on the public debt, or to serve as an accounting mechanism to add to the cost of proposals from the authorizing committees, then we might as well go out of business. If that is the will of the Senate, so be it. I and my 15 colleagues have other interests we could pursue, and other committees on which we might focus our attention. If, indeed, we have been wasting our time for the past 4 years working on budget resolutions and advising the Senate on the budget implications of all major legislation, then we might as well close our doors.

Indeed, for the past week, Mr. President, our committee has been working 15 hours a day, late into the evening, to prepare the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979. We have been trying to review the 19 functions of the budget and to set national spending priorities.

By forcing the Senate to consider this 1979 spending bill in advance of congressional action on the budget resolution, the Agriculture Committee is saying that farm spending must go ahead of every other important national issue, from defense through income security to interest on the national debt.

Mr. President, this kind of conduct is not consistent with the Budget Act; and so, in due course, if the motion of the Senator from Georgia is defeated, I will raise the point of order against the conference report.

May I say to my colleagues that the Parliamentarian advises me that the effect of that would be the same as a motion to recommit to the conference. If the point of order is sustained, the bill will go back to conference, and the conferees will have another opportunity to work their will on this bill and report it to the Senate. That is the purpose of the point of order.

Mr. DOLE and Mr. McGOVERN addressed the Chair.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ZORINSKY). The Senator has 32 minutes remaining.

Mr. MUSKIE. At some point I would like to get into that part of what I want to say that addresses the merits of the conference report, and I am prepared to do that, if the distinguished floor manager is willing.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to discuss the budget impact of this bill, since I think that is the matter which most concerns him, and also the impact of the bill on the consumers? Those are the points that he has raised in the letter he sent to us.

Mr. MUSKIE. I have not yet raised those points this morning, and I am about to do that. I simply would inquire of the Senator from Georgia if he wishes me to continue using time at this point.

Mr. TALMADGE. If the Senator will proceed, that is fine with me.

Mr. MUSKIE. All right; then I will proceed, and I will try to yield to the Senator from South Dakota at the appropriate point.

Mr. President, as my colleagues will recall, the Senate version contained several contradictory set-aside programs and new farm subsidy provisions which carried extremely high costs to the Government and the consumer. Moreover, this program would have made our Nation vulnerable to future crop failures. So contradictory were the various provisions of that measure that CBO was unable to come up with a cost estimate for the entire bill, and we have never been able to get that cost estimate for the entire bill from the CBO because of the contradictory provisions. So this is one proposal to which I have no answer, to which the CBO has no answer, and under which we have no way to estimate the budgetary costs.

I suspect that many of my colleagues voted for this bill because of assurances they received from the chairman of the Agriculture Committee that the conference would produce a more responsible piece of legislation. I regret that the majority of Senators voted for this measure, which they knew to be unsound economic and agricultural policy.

The conferees have succeeded in adding insult to injury by compounding the inflationary and ill-conceived economic policies contained in this bill.

Mr. President, let us take a look at what the conferees have brought back to this body for our consideration and approval.

First, they have accepted the flexible parity concept proposed by my colleague from Kansas and, at the same time, have increased the target and loan price schedule for the commodities covered in this bill.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a correction?

Mr. MUSKIE. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. I would just point out that the loan rates in the conference report are lower than those passed by the Senate. In fact, the Senator from Montana was just complaining about that action by the conference.

Mr. MUSKIE. I understand that the target prices are higher than your provision in the Senate.

Mr. DOLE. No, the target prices remain the same under flexible parity, except that the first jump was higher. From that standpoint, that is accurate.

Mr. MUSKIE. All right; I accept that correction.

Second, the conferees rejected every substitute to these inflationary measures. They rejected a substitute by Representative FOLEY which would have made a permanent change in the 1977 farm bill for target prices and loan rates for wheat, feed grains, and cotton. CBO analyzed the Foley substitute and concluded that it would be significantly less inflationary than the bill reported by the conferees.

The conferees also rejected the administration's recommendation to modify the conference report to reflect recently announced administration initiatives. As you know, between the time the Senate passed H.R. 6782 and the beginning of the conference the administration set forth a nine-point program which would, as I have stated earlier:

Provide greater economic incentives for participation in farm programs;

Give immediate cash assistance yielding crop producers approximately $3–4 billion in new returns;

Strengthen market prices by bringing supplies and demand into better balance;

Conserve energy and natural resources while providing an accessible land reserve for use when needed.

But, again, Mr. President, the conferees cast caution to the wind and went far beyond these more reasonable alternatives.

Even the Foley proposal, I should note, would have carried a high price tag in terms of budgetary costs. At least, however, economic impact might have been somewhat more equitable since its impact on food prices would have been less severe. Food price inflation is the cruelest kind of tax—a regressive tax. The burden of this bill will be carried disproportionately by the poor and middle-income citizens.

Mr. President, we should recognize by now that Federal programs which aid farmers cannot create money out of thin air. Sooner or later, unless dramatic changes occur, those dollars which are added to farm income must come either from U.S. taxpayers in the form of higher spending or from consumers in the form of higher food prices. In either case, it is the American people who must foot the bill.

Certainly the American consumer will not be fooled when he sees his food bills increase by nearly 3 percent in the upcoming fiscal year. Over $5 billion will come out of the pocketbooks of American consumers to finance this legislation. In other words, the average American family of four will end up paying about $100 a year more for food when this bill is added to the recent administrative actions.

As for the inflationary impact of this legislation, CBO estimates that the fiscal year 1979 food component of the consumer price index will increase approximately 2.5 percent over January current policy projections, adding approximately 0.5 points to the overall rate of inflation.

However, this is merely the first-round effect. Wages and long-term contracts tied to the CPI will also be adjusted upward, and as a result prices will rise throughout the economy.

By 1981, the first round plus the secondary and tertiary effects flowing from this legislation, plus USDA action, will have added a full point to the overall consumer price index.

In terms of budget impact, CBO estimates that this legislation will require approximately $5.7 billion in outlays over current policy estimates in fiscal year 1979.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the tables including CBO estimates be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, D.C., April 6, 1978.

Hon. EDMUND S. MUSKIE,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In response to your request of March 31, we have supplied the Budget Committee staff with estimates of the budget and economic impact of H.R. 6782, the Emergency Agricultural Act of 1978, as agreed to by the House and Senate conferees on April 5. This letter provides some of the highlights of these estimates.

Table 1 summarizes the 1978 and 1979 estimated budget costs of H.R. 6782 and the effect of the administrative actions announced March 29 by the Department of Agriculture. We estimate that the effect of H.R. 6782 would be to lower 1978 estimated outlays for Commodity Credit Corporation price support programs by $375 million, and to increase 1979 estimated outlays by $5.7 billion. The estimated effect of the administrative actions announced March 29 and other technical adjustments is to lower 1978 outlays by $302 million, and to lower 1979 outlays by $1.7 billion.

TABLE 1.—CBO ESTIMATE OF THE BUDGET IMPACT OF H.R. 6782

[By fiscal years; in millions of dollars]

	1978		1979
	Budget authority	Outlays	Budget authority	Outlays
CBO current policy base (February estimate)	1,628	7,420	7,257	6,511
Administrative actions announced Mar. 29 and other changes [1]	−302	−302	−1,696	−1,696
H.R. 6782 conference agreement	−375	−375	+5,930	+5,699
Total CCC price support programs [2]	951	6,743	11,491	10,514

[1] Includes technical reestimates, primarily for dairy price supports.
[2] Includes administrative expenses and excludes National Wool Act.

The estimates assume that 90 percent of the wheat producers, 80 percent of the cotton producers and 50 percent of the feed grain producers will choose the 50 percent set-aside program provided by H.R. 6782. Other specific assumptions underlying these estimates have been provided to the Budget Committee staff.

Table 2. provides our estimates of the direct effect of the enactment of H.R. 6782 on prices. The ultimate effect on the total CPI may be approximately double the initial impact because of cost-of-living wage adjustments.

Increase in food bill for typical urban family of four (January 1978 dollars)	$46 to $63

Other details concerning the estimated impact of H.R. 6782 on production, domestic consumption, ending stocks, and volume of exports have been provided to the Committee staff.

Sincerely,

ALICE M. RIVLIN,
Director.

Mr. MUSKIE. We have a costly and dangerously inflationary bill before us—a bill that will hit the pocketbook of every American taxpayer and consumer.

Apparently, my colleagues have not heeded the early warning signs that inflationary pressures are on the rise. The recent surge in consumer and wholesale prices is largely attributable to sharp increases in the price of food which have already taken place. Are we to make double-digit food inflation a permanent feature of our economy?

If we now pass this bill which will accelerate food price inflation, we will raise the underlying inflationary momentum in the economy. As I have pointed out before, inflation is sustained by the determination of every individual in every sector to catch up with inflation. This process is sustained in large part by the administration and the Congress, as we take economic policy decisions which have large inflationary effects. The list of culprits include increased agriculture price supports, higher payroll taxes, the increase in the minimum wage, import restrictions, and certain regulatory activities, to name only a few. I believe we are discovering that one of the most serious problems in an underemployed economy is the pressure it creates to adopt policies to protect incomes which add fuel to the inflationary cycle.

I had hoped that the congressional budget process would provide us with a mechanism for resisting these pressures for politically expedient action. Mr. President, I confess that legislation such as this undermines my faith in the ability of Congress to act responsibly on tax and spending legislation.

H.R. 6782 is but another glaring example of ill-conceived economic policy. In a headlong rush to respond to the strident voices of one segment of our farm population, we have ignored the impact this measure will have on the dairy, poultry, and livestock producers, and the agricultural sector as a whole. The bill reported by the conferees would aid grain producers while severely hurting livestock producers. The price of corn, a staple feed grain, is projected to rise to $2.45 a bushel in fiscal year 1979 under this bill, as opposed to $2.25 without it and $2 before the administration acted.

Furthermore, within the farm sector, only 5 percent of all farms, the largest ones, will reap approximately one-third of 1 percent of the benefits from this program. This same group averaged approximately $50,000 in net income last year—a bad year for grain farmers. Clearly, these agricultural executives are not in need of additional Federal assistance at the expense of American consumers and taxpayers and other farm producers.

Ironically, 60 percent of all farmers—those small farmers facing the most serious financial difficulties—will reap only a small portion of the benefits from this program. I am sure many of these people have been told that this bill will provide them with relief. The hard facts reveal the absurdity of such assertions. I sympathize with these farmers. I believe they, and the rest of us, have been sold a phony bill of goods.

We should recognize that the financial squeeze now being felt by some farmers stems from ill-timed investments they made in land and machinery when prices for grain were exceptionally high. Has the time arrived for Government to rescue all of us from our mistakes? Is it time to bail out every small and large businessman who makes an unsound investment? Is that our free market system, our economic system of reward for initiative and risk taking?

Finally, I think we are just beginning to see the effects of the 1977 farm bill in agriculture. For 1978, net farm income is already approximately $3 billion higher than last year, even without any new farm entitlement program.

As I indicated earlier, agricultural prices are now rising substantially. This ill-conceived legislation is designed to fight the last war, not the real economic battle we face this year, which is the battle against inflation.

Mr. President, we must also recognize that this bill will adversely impact on U.S. grain reserves. Bad weather combined with the set-aside program could reduce U.S. grain stocks to dangerously low levels. Wheat and feed grains stocks could fall to levels of the 1974–75 levels, when we had exceptionally high prices. CBO estimates that under this provision carryover stocks could fall 24 percent below its January current policy estimate. The administration's initiatives would have reduced stocks only about 7 percent under current policy. The 2.2 billion bushel grain reserve estimated under the conference agreement is a dangerously low level which could be wiped out by any number of unforeseen circumstances, including the weather and changes in world grain demand.

I think it is not prudent to play Russian roulette with the American and world economy. A healthy reserve is essential to economic stability.

Do members realize the possible consequences of this foolhardy policy? In 1973–74, we ran short of reserves, we had double-digit food inflation, followed inevitably by restrictive anti-inflationary monetary policies and by deep recession. We got nearly 9 percent unemployment. We got the massive weakening in both U.S. and foreign economies which is still with us. And from this we got the economic budget deficits we have faced since that time.

The next time it will be worse. Accelerating inflation will lead to tighter monetary policies—Chairman Miller has already told us that. Another similar recession will produce our first $100 billion dollar budget deficit. Is that what the Congress wants to vote for today?

H.R. 6782 is not the answer to the financial problems facing American farmers.

Mr. President, perhaps it is expecting too much in an election year for Congress to act responsibly on controversial spending and tax legislation. And, of course, there is always that temptation, in times such as these, for us to shirk our responsibilities and leave the difficult decisions up to the President. As chairman of the Budget Committee, I am deeply disappointed that we, as a legislative body, have failed to live up to high expectations in our deliberations on major economic decisions. In this case, we have clearly acted recklessly in adopting an extravagantly expensive farm bill, which could have tragic consequences for our economy. Indeed, we have acted so hastily in this instance that we have not had the benefit of cost and budget information on the consequences of this bill.

Mr. President, the responsible thing to do at this stage is to reject the conference report and not leave it up to the President to veto the bill.

We should also realize that certain politicians will surely exploit the discontent of frustrated farmers to further their own political ambitions. To these people I would like to point out that no one gains under this legislation: not the U.S. farmers—not the U.S. consumer—not the U.S. economy—not Congress—and not the President.

We all lose.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I have agreed to yield 15 minutes to other Senators. The Senator from South Dakota would like to put some questions.

I will be happy to yield 5 minutes of my time to listen to the questions of the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maine.

I believe Senators appreciate the conscientious way in which the Senator from Maine is discharging his duties as chairman of the Budget Committee. I do not know of any Senator who wants to do away with the excellent work the committee has done. There are times, though, and I know the Senator from Maine recognizes this, when even the most carefully laid plans have to be revised to meet difficult circumstances.

I would like to suggest to the Senator from Maine that I am just as concerned as he is about respect for the Federal budget. The Senator knows that whether we do anything at all for farmers this year we are estimated to run a $60 billion Federal deficit. We cannot blame that on this farm bill or any other bill pending here for farmers. That deficit is projected by the Senator's own committee whether we vote yes or no on this bill.

We also know——

Mr. MUSKIE. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. McGOVERN. I yield.

Mr. MUSKIE. We have no estimate as to the deficit for fiscal 1979 at this point.

Mr. McGOVERN. The Senator was at least sure enough of it so that he said in his letter to Members of the Senate that the coming year's deficit is already estimated at $60 billion or more.

Mr. MUSKIE. It is estimated by the administration, that is correct. We have the administration's estimate which is now $61.5 billion. We have not completed our work. We hope to come in under that number. This bill, of course, would make it much more than that.

Mr. McGOVERN. Let us take the word of the Congressional Budget Office that this bill in this current fiscal year will save $375 million, but that in fiscal year 1979 it will cost $5.6 billion. I do not know whether those estimates are right or not, but I am willing to accept them.

Mr. MUSKIE. May I make an observation?

Mr. McGOVERN. Let us round it out to $6 billion and say for purposes of argument the bill will cost the Treasury $6 billion.

Mr. MUSKIE. The Senator's question reminds me of another point which I think is very important. There ought to be another point of order. The conference eliminated all additional 1978 spending under the bill, but it provided the provision on page 3 of the conference report, section 103. This provision is designed to get around the Budget Act, to avoid a point of order which would have been in order if there had been additional 1978 spending. But instead this provision makes it possible for farmers, after next October, to renegotiate their contracts on the 1978 crop, and to renegotiate them on the basis of the new target prices. We do not know what that bill will be. We do not know at all. Part of that cost is included in the estimate of 1979 and it is really a 1978 cost. So the conference has further confused the question of cost by that kind of legislative legerdemain. I think it is important to make the point.

Mr. McGOVERN. If the Senator will just let me accept for purposes of argument whatever he thinks the cost of this bill is——

Mr. MUSKIE. I am concerned not only with cost but with this kind of device designed to avoid facing up to the cost under the budget discipline.

Mr. McGOVERN. Let us estimate that it is somewhere around $6 billion in cost, which seems to be in the neighborhood of what the Congressional Budget Office is recommending. I would like to suggest to the Senator that there is a way to handle that without adding one penny to the Federal deficit this year or next year. That is for us to reduce the proposed $25 billion tax reduction by that amount. I think the administration is mistaken in any event in recommending a $25 billion tax cut at a time when we have urgent needs of the kind which now face American agriculture. We have very serious needs in the cities. We have a desperate need to be moving ahead on the development of solar energy and other forms of renewable energy.

At the appropriate point in this session, I am going to move—and I hope other Senators will join in this effort—that instead of the $25 billion tax cut we reduce that figure by whatever is necessary to cover the cost of the farm program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McGOVERN. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. MUSKIE. Why do I not yield to Senator CLARK at this point to be sure he gets his time and then I will be back. I would like to yield myself one more minute to make a point.

The kind of trade-offs the Senator is talking about are supposed to be made first in the Budget Committee as it deliberates the first concurrent budget resolution. This whole procedure undermines that. This cannot be done on the floor of the Senate. It can be done later after the budget resolution comes in and the Senate debates it. The trade-off the Senator is proposing may very well be a reasonable trade-off, but it should not be made here. The Senator is assuming that if we look at the whole picture, certain trade-offs that the Senator prefers could be made. Maybe his preference would be in the majority position and maybe it would not be. But the place to do it is under the provisions of the Budget Act. This bill torpedoes all of that.

Mr. McGOVERN. As the Senator knowns, I appeared before his committee to tell him what I had in mind in terms of the tax cut.

Mr. MUSKIE. I understand that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McGOVERN. I must say that I was very surprised that the Senator's Budget Committee increased the President's military budget by almost $2 billion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MUSKIE. I will respond to that in a moment. When the Senator wanted to present those issues, we welcomed him before the Budget Committee. We held a special hearing for him. We are always willing to do that. But that is the place to do it.

Mr. McGOVERN. That is why I appeared before the committee.

Mr. MUSKIE. But this bill is not there. It is here. This conference report has never been before the Senate Budget Committee. The motion of the Senator from Georgia is to suspend the Budget Act so that it does not have to go there. That is the point I am making to the Senator. He can have his own priorities. I have mine. Sixteen members of the Budget Committee have theirs, and 100 Members of this body have theirs. It is for the purpose of organizing and handling those in a deliberate, rational fashion that we adopted the Budget Act. The Senator cannot persuade me that considering this bill here today is consistent with procedures of the Budget Act.

Mr. McGOVERN. The Senator knows that, in the last analysis, 100 Senators have to decide everything that we decide. It is not just my priorities. I am willing to take my chances with what the Senate will do here today, but there is no way we can devise a budget procedure that ought to foreclose action on this floor to modify it and react to it. The Budget Committee can make its recommendations.

If I understand that act properly, we always have the recourse, as Members of this body, to modify the action of that committee. That is what this debate is all about today.

Mr. MUSKIE. We have a procedure to apply to the Budget Committee for a waiver. That has not been done. The Budget Committee acts on the waiver and listens to the case made. That has not been done.

The Budget Committee reports the waiver to the floor, where the Senate can consider it. That has not been done. So I am not impressed by the Senator's argument. The procedures of the Budget Act have not been followed.

Mr. McGOVERN. We moved just as quickly as we could on this bill, I say to the Senator.

Mr. MUSKIE. You have had 3 days to apply for a waiver.

Mr. McGOVERN. It is remarkable, in my judgment, that we were able to complete action on it and bring it to the floor as quickly as we have. If I had ever thought that the Budget Act would foreclose this kind of procedure for us to deal with an emergency situation of this kind, with a major part of our economy facing a crisis that is going to have a much more serious impact on the budget than anything we do here today if we reject this legislation—the Senator needs to keep in mind, too, that if we have several million farmers going bankrupt in this country, that has an impact on the budget, too. It is a loss of revenue, it is a loss of purchasing power, it is a loss of our basic food producing industry. Those are considerations that we need to be looking at as well as these technical procedures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has 15 minutes.

Mr. MUSKIE. I shall use 1 minute, and I shall not yield on this minute.

The staff of the Budget Committee asked the staff of the conference last Wednesday to submit a waiver. We repeated that request later in the week. We got no response. What the Senator from South Dakota regards as a mere technicality is an important procedural safeguard to insure that the fundamental problems of farmers, defense, consumers, and everybody else are protected.

If the Senator from South Dakota chooses to say that once he decides that the Budget Act is an inconvenience, we ought to set it aside casually, I cannot go along with that.

I yield 10 minutes at this point to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the distinguished Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, the issue here today, in my judgment, is not really the Dole flexible set-aside bill, although we are here to debate the conference report on H.R. 6782—and that report is now a modified version of the earlier Dole flexible set-aside proposal.

The real issue today is whether or not the Congress leaves farmers with nothing at all in the way of additional economic protections for 1978.

It is clear to everyone that the Dole proposal cannot be passed into law. A vote for that measure is a vote for no additional economic protections for farmers for this year. Mr. President, I do not want that to happen, and I hope my colleagues in the Senate will not permit it to happen.

The President has promised—unequivocally—to veto the Dole bill. In his letter of April 6 to Senator TALMADGE, chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, the President says:

> Should that legislation reach my desk, it will be vetoed.

That statement is unequivocal. Nothing could be more clear.

Some have said that the President is bluffing, and that he will sign H.R. 6782 into law if Congress will only pass it. Such an action is unimaginable after the letter the President wrote to Senator TALMADGE.

Others say that a veto can be overridden. No one can say for sure about such things, of course, but I am convinced that the President would veto this bill, and that it would have little chance of overriding a veto—particularly in the House. I conclude that the flexible set-aside proposal cannot now be passed into law.

So, the issue here is whether we can provide some increased price supports for farmers this year, or whether they are to be left with prices below costs of production for 1978.

I do not want to see farmers left with no additional protections for this year. I believe that would be the final development in a long and cruel hoax played against our farmers. It would mean that we participated in 3 weeks of hearings this spring with more than 150 witnesses and worked through 4 major emergency proposals, including the McGovern bill; the Dole bill; the Talmadge bill; and the Eagleton bill; and then refused to work with the White House and the administration to find a compromise that could actually be accepted.

Mr. President, I will not vote to send to the President a bill that I know he must and should veto at the expense of a chance of working out some measure that will give farmers stronger prices this year—a measure that would be acceptable to the President, the Congress, to the country.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I shall yield at the end of my time.

That measure would be acceptable to the President and to the Congress and to the country.

The administration has indicated that they will accept a proposal that would increase target prices for wheat significantly, by around 50 cents.

[Disturbance in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be order in the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest that a similarly moderate increase in supports for feed grains also might be acceptable to the administration. This would greatly increase the attractiveness of the administration-announced set-aside programs. It would not cost much money, given current market prices. Mr. President, I would hope that the Congress will instruct the conferees to reexamine the proposals contained in H.R. 6782 and attempt to produce a bill that will increase price supports, and that the President will sign.

I would think that even the strongest supporters of the Dole bill would prefer an increase in target prices such as the President has indicated that he will accept rather than press for a veto and no increase in price supports at all for this year, which is exactly what we are going to get if we press this proposal.

Mr. President, farmers still face two very real and immediate needs. The first is to reduce the acreage planted for the 1978 crop. The second is for additional price supports and income to offset a very serious cost-price squeeze this year. Very simply, grain prices are below costs of production.

The administration's new initiatives are a very positive step. In my judgment, for feed grains, at least, the proposal to pay farmers to set aside up to 20 percent of their acres in 1978 will help. I believe there will be significant participation in that program, even though it was announced too late. And the administration deserves criticism for the lateness of that announcement.

That program increases the odds that farmers will not overproduce this year. But it does not give them the protections they need against price disasters—protections to help them cover their costs of production in the event that good weather does cause overproduction once again.

Both the administration and the Congress promised farmers programs that would protect prices at the average cost of production. The President said so in Des Moines in his campaign. The Congress has promised it over and over again. We do not have those protections now and farmers are losing money because we do not.

We still have a chance to provide those protections. By voting down the pending motion we can return this bill to the conference and then the conference can combine the best features of the McGovern bill, the Talmadge bill, and the Foley compromise. I believe the President would find a combination of the best features of all three proposals very difficult to reject.

Mr. President, there have been a number of arguments made against the Dole bill in recent weeks on the grounds that it would cost the Government an additional several billion dollars over the next 2 fiscal years, and on the grounds that it would add additional points to our inflation.

I do not know the exact figures, but they are not the most serious weaknesses in this very bad bill, in my judgment.

Its most serious shortcoming, I believe, is that it mobilizes producers of wheat, cotton, and feed grains against all the rest of agriculture. It authorizes very great incentives for producers of those grains of cotton to divert large amounts of land. But it has no protections at all for producers of hogs, cattle, soybeans, or for dairymen or poultrymen. It would very likely lead to sharp increases in costs for those farmers, and to sharp drops in their incomes.

I will never advocate cheap corn, Mr. President. I know that low corn prices such as those we have had this year are bad for livestock producers and grain producers, as well. Low feed prices overstimulate the livestock sectors and lead to overproduction and prices break later on. Corn prices have been too low, and I would certainly like to see them higher for the reasons I have just stated about feed grains.

But feed grain prices that are too high also would be a very serious problem for the hog feeders and the cattle feeders of my State. They oppose this bill. And, the Dole bill could lead to very high corn prices and very sharp increases in cost for all livestock producers and dairymen. USDA estimates that this proposal could lead to a reduction in feed grain acres on the order of 24.6 million acres—a reduction that would lead to corn prices in the $4 range if we had anything less than a bumper crop. It could mean even much higher prices than that if weather were bad.

Four-dollar corn means that hog producers must have $60 hogs just to break even—but we cannot expect $60 hogs this year. Corn as high as $4 would mean a disastrous economic shock to every part of the livestock economy that depends on feed grains—especially so, if the increase came very rapidly as it might, given the very large acreage diversion authorized in this bill.

Cattle feeders' costs could be increased still another way under this bill. The incentives to set aside corn land are so great that many soybean farmers would be expected to declare soybean land to be intended for corn production and set aside the maximum number of acres. We could easily end up with 6 million acres less in soybeans this year under the Dole bill, than under current programs.

Soybean prices are fairly strong now, and should be around $7 for the year. A large acreage reduction would send them through the roof. That would be very good news for our Brazilian competitors, but bad news for our livestock feeders who must buy soybean meal—and bad news for our customers in Japan and Europe, and ultimately for soybean producers. We could even see embargoes again if weather were unusually bad.

Mr. President, what farmers need are programs that work equitably to support prices at fair levels. We need to reduce production this year—we need a set-aside program that works, and we need price supports that cover average costs of production. I believe that we very badly need to strengthen our current programs in that regard.

The Dole bill is far too drastic, at least as regards the diversified Corn Belt farmer. It contains incentives that could lead to huge production adjustments for our crops, and cause extreme economic dislocation for our livestock economy—and for our customers overseas—upon whom we are very dependent.

Mr. President, the debate on this emergency farm bill has been long and it has been emotional. Many farmers came to town and emphasized their point that they need more protection than the 1977 bill contains. I think they made that point very well, and that there is now broad agreement that those programs should be strengthened. I believe the administration's announcements and initiatives over the last few days indicate that they also are now convinced that changes should be made. Farmers here have helped us to get those changes.

I believe that the time has come to put the emotion and the politics of this debate behind us. I believe that we must recognize the concerns of all participants, rather than just a few—the President's concerns about costs and inflation—the Budget Committee concerns—the livestock producers' and dairymens' concerns about their costs—our foreign customers' concerns about reliable supplies—and, most of all, farmers' concerns about low prices and low incomes. The time has come to recognize all these concerns and to develop a bill that would do all that, and pass it and send it to the President so that we can have the protections we need for this year.

I suggest that can still be done. I believe that the conferees can go back and combine the best features of the McGovern bill, the Talmadge bill, and the Foley bill, and come up with a bill the President will accept. I hope my colleagues will join me in voting to recommit H.R. 6782 and ask the conference to come back with such a proposal.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, how much time remains on both sides?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has 22 minutes.

Mr. TALMADGE. And the Senator from Maine?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has 4 minutes.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I wish to compliment the Senator from Maine, not only for his argument, but on the way he has handled his job as chairman of the Committee on the Budget.

I do take exception to the idea the Budget Committee is the parent of the Senate and not vice versa.

My motion to suspend the rule here is in the very language of the act creating the Budget Committee.

I was a very strong supporter of the creation of the Budget Committee. In fact, in conference I made the motion it be agreed to and I have tried to support it consistently.

We are acting under the terms and under the language of the act creating the Budget Committee itself to suspend the resolution at this particular time in order that we can act on an emergency basis.

Mr. President, my motion to suspend section 303(A) of the Congressional Budget Act with respect to the Senate's consideration of the conference report on H.R. 6782 is not made casually or frivolously. The conference substitute adopted by the committee of conference is emergency farm legislation that is important to the entire agricultural economy. It is imperative that the Congress act on the legislation as soon as possible.

As I stated a moment ago, I was one of the original supporters of the Congressional Budget Act. I am strongly in favor of the act. I do not want to do anything that would weaken the act. I think it holds great opportunities for us to bring Federal expenditures under control.

In moving that section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act be suspended for purposes of allowing the Senate to work its will on the conference report on H.R. 6782, I am simply asking the Senate to exercise a procedural right under section 904(b) of the act that enables the Senate to say—"we are going to take up the conference report, notwithstanding the point of order that can be raised under section 303(a) of the act." That is not a waiver of the procedures. It is an exercise of the rights that the Senate has under the procedures.

Section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act provides that a point of order may be raised in the Senate with respect to the consideration of "any bill or resolution (or any amendment thereto)" that provides new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of that act that is to become effective during a fiscal year if the first concurrent resolution on the budget for that year has not been agreed to.

H.R. 6782, as amended by the committee of conference, increases the loan rates and target prices for the 1978 crops of wheat, feedgrains, and upland cotton, and is deemed to be new spending authority within the meaning of section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget

Act. The increases are effective October 1, 1978, and the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1979 has not been adopted.

In my opinion, it is arguable whether section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act applies to conference reports. There is language in other sections of the act making specific reference to conference reports—they are not encompassed by the terms "any bill or resolution (or amendment thereto)." I believe that the better interpretation is that section 303(a) does not apply to conference reports. However, I understand that the parliamentarian is of the opinion that a point of order could properly be made under section 303(a) with respect to the consideration of the conference report on H.R. 6782, and would so advise the Chair.

The question, therefore, becomes: "What means are available to waive or suspend section 303(a) in order to permit the Senate to consider this conference report?" Section 303(c) provides a waiver procedure for any "committee of the Senate" that reports a bill or resolution subject to a section 303(a) point of order. That procedure involves the reporting of a waiver resolution, which is referred to the Committee on the Budget.

The argument has been advanced that when a committee of conference submits a report containing a bill that is subject to a point of order under section 303(a), the Senate committee which originally considered the measure must report a section 303(c) waiver resolution for referral to the Committee on the Budget.

I find this argument unconvincing for several reasons: First, section 303(c) specifically applies to committees of the Senate and not conference committees, which have never been considered as committees of the Senate; second, the Senate conferees represent the Senate and not the members of the committee that originally considered the bill; and third, the Congressional Budget Act specifically provides an alternative procedure in section 904(b) under which section 303(a) may be waived or suspended in the Senate by a majority vote of the Members voting, a quorum being present, or by the unanimous consent of the Senate. I understand that the parliamentarian has advised the Chair that section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act may be waived or suspended under section 904(b).

The waiver or suspension of section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act under section 904(b) is, in my view, entirely proper in this case. I state again that the legislation we are considering is emergency legislation. When this legislation (in another form) was originally considered by the Senate, the increases in 1978 loan rates and target prices would have been effective upon enactment. Under section 401(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, a point of order could, therefore, have been raised with respect to the consideration of the legislation. The same point of order could have been raised with respect to the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota (Mr. McGOVERN) and the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE).

However, the distinguished Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE) did not raise any point of order, and I think it was entirely appropriate that he not do so, and I thank him. The Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry cooperated fully with the Committee on the Budget with respect to H.R. 6782 and S. 2481 prior to reporting the measures to the Senate. We filed the requisite waiver resolutions, and agreed to offer floor amendments to meet their concerns.

I think that the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry has an excellent relationship with the Committee on the Budget. I want to see that relationshhip continue. Our objectives are the same: We want to see the Congressional Budget Act succeed.

However, if the farmers are to get relief this year, time is of the essence. It is already late. Much of the Southeastern crops are in the ground. Much of the Southwestern crops are in the ground.

I would have preferred a different vehicle, but this is the only one before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. MUSKIE. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield.

Mr. MUSKIE. I do not want to interrupt the present thought of the Senator's discourse, but I thought it might be useful to indicate for the record that section 904, which is the section to which the Senator refers, providing suspension of the Budget Act, was not designed as a routine act. It was designed to avoid depriving us of the opportunity to change the Senate rules, and if we had not had that provision written in the Budget Act into law with respect to the Senate rules, our hands might be tied.

That is why section 904 was written in, not as a routine way to put the Budget Act aside, but it had a very specific purpose.

The Senator is free to make his argument, of course, but I thought that legislative history would be important.

Mr. TALMADGE. Of course, the Senator is entirely correct.

We work with the Budget Committee and the Budget Committee works with the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Foresty. I appreciate that relationship.

But when time is of the essence, when the emergency is upon us, when relief is needed today, it is time for the Senate to act, and the Senate is the parent of the Budget Committee, not the other way around.

That is the reason I made the motion under the terms of the act creating the Budget Committee, so we can act today.

We have had a lot of talk about inflation and inflation is a reality. But where is that inflation, Mr. President?

About 33 cents of the housewife's food dollar goes to the farmer and about 66 cents plus goes to everyone else, those dealing with transporting, manufacturing, processing, and selling agricultural commodities.

The truth of the matter is that agricultural income for farmers today is about 65 percent of parity. That is the lowest it has been since the depression years of the 1930's. That is the reason we see farms going on the auction block throughout the country, because they cannot pay their debts. That is the reason we see farmers crying for emergency aid and disaster funds, because throughout the length and breadth of this country they are selling commodities below the cost of production.

This shirt I have on is a cotton shirt. Do you know what it cost, Mr. President? About $20. Do you know how much cotton it has in it? Less than 50 cents worth.

The Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from Kansas pointed out that a loaf of bread that sells for about 75 cents has only about a nickel's worth of wheat in it.

How can we expect farmers to carry the whole burden of inflation? Inflation has hit farmers harder than any other segment of our society.

Fuel oil that cost 15 cents a gallon about 4 years ago is now about 45 cents a gallon. Fertilizer, machinery, insecticides and pesticides, and everything else the farmer buys have gone up accordingly.

We hear a great hue and cry that we cannot do anything to help farmers, because it will create more inflation. But the inflation, Mr. President, is not on the farms, the pressure is on the farmers themselves.

Tractors that cost $2,000 and $3,000 4 or 5 years ago now sell for $7,000, $8,000, $9,000, and $10,000.

The same thing is true of all the other agricultural equipment.

Mr. McGOVERN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. TALMADGE. Yes. I yield to my distinguished colleague, the able Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, is it not a fact that most foods are not price supported at all, they are not under the price support program?

Most things we buy in the supermarkets have nothing to do with the support of grain and wheat.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. McGOVERN. Sometimes it might leave the impression that we are supporting everything. We are not. That is a very small part of the total food budget. It has nothing to do with most of the things we buy in the supermarket.

Mr. TALMADGE. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. President, at an appropriate time, I will ask for the yeas and nays on my motion to suspend. We have nine Senators in the Chamber. I ask the aides to check the cloakrooms and the corridors to see if they can produce a few more Senators on the floor, so that I can get the yeas and nays.

We have enough Senators now. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, how much time does the distinguished Senator from Kansas desire?

Mr. DOLE. If possible, I would like 10 minutes at the close of the debate.

Mr. TALMADGE. How much time remains, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has 16 minutes.

Mr. TALMADGE. And the Senator from Maine?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Four minutes to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. DOLE. Does the Senator from Maine wish to take his time now?

Mr. MUSKIE. I will reserve my 4 minutes.

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished chairman.

Mr. President, since most of the thrust of the attack has been against the bill that bears my name—and I might add that it bears the names of 21 other Senators, Democrats and Republicans, including the distinguished Presiding Officer at this moment, the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. ZORINSKY)—I want to set the record straight very early that it is not a partisan effort by Senator DOLE. It is an effort by 22 Senators, Democrats and Republicans, about equally divided, who are concerned about the American farmer.

I say to my distinguished friend from Iowa, and my distinguished friend from Maine that I checked the record, and I note that both voted for the Emergency Act of 1975. That was called inflationary by then President Ford. He indicated to the Senate that if it came to him, he would veto it, and he did. But I did not hear the Senator from Iowa make a speech that we should have low farm prices, because President Ford might veto that bill. The Senator from Iowa said a few moments ago that he would not vote for a bill if the President said he would veto it. Well, the Senator voted for that bill in 1975.

So I remind my distinguished colleague, who apparently is satisfied with low farm prices, that that is a choice he can make.

There have been some comments that the Dole bill would take out all this production in States such as Iowa. According to CBO estimates, which we are asked to accept as the gospel in this Chamber, title II, which was the Dole bill, would take out about 22 million acres, as compared with so-called title I, the retirement bill, which would take out not less than 31 million acres.

I predicted at a quarter after 9 that someone would stand up and say that this bill is going to cost $6 billion. They never told us where that figure came from, and we have not heard yet where the $6 billion figure came from, how it was arrived at. That is just for press consumption. That is so the press will understand that this $6 billion——

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. MUSKIE. The Senator overlooks the fact that I put in the record a table of CBO estimates which produced this in the RECORD. If I had more time, I would be glad to read the table. It is in the RECORD.

Mr. DOLE. We will not have the RECORD until tomorrow.

Mr. MUSKIE. I would be glad to send a copy to the Senator now.

Mr. DOLE. What about the other 98 Senators?

Mr. MUSKIE. I am sorry. We have a unanimous-consent agreement, to which both sides agreed, which limits each side to an hour. By definition, it limits the scope of the argument. I am sorry that I did not happen to touch the particular point, but the Senator did not touch a lot of points I would like him to discuss.

Mr. DOLE. I am going to do it right now.

Mr. MUSKIE. The Senator has not succeeded yet.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Maine had an hour. The Senator from Kansas has had 8 minutes so far.

Mr. MUSKIE. I yielded some of my time to the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. DOLE. I appreciate that.

Mr. MUSKIE. I did not use the hour.

Mr. DOLE. The Senator from Maine had control of an hour.

I want to be accurate, because we are dealing with the Budget Committee, and they are always very accurate. I serve on that committee, and I know they are accurate. But I know how you arrive at assumptions. If you are against a proposal, you use the worst possible case.

The CBO figures say there is going to be 90 percent participation by farmers setting aside 50 percent of their wheat production. I do not accept that. But you have to use that low figure to make the costs so bad. The costs, based on CBO estimates, is about $6 billion. You passed that out to the public and the press, who wrote editorials about it.

The USDA has now released some new figures on the cost production for selected crops. The range for production cost on wheat is $3.66 to $3.92 a bushel. The range on cotton is up to 66 cents a pound. The range for corn, I say to the distinguished Senator from Iowa, is now $2.54 to $2.71 per bushel.

Mr. President, I think we should set the record straight for once, because many Senators are very troubled by this bill. The administration is working very hard—the President, the Vice President, and there are lobbyists all over the Capitol—trying to figure a way to defeat this bill in conference, to avoid sending it to the President, because he does not want to have to veto it. So the best way is to kill it in the Senate or in the House.

We should not be flourishing figures of $5.7 billion when there is no proof. We have been told by the Budget Committee that it will cost $5.7 billion, and there is nothing to support that. The same arguments can be raised against the milk bill, too.

Not long ago, a poll was taken of 1,259 adults, and 5 out of 6 were for raising the prices farmers are receiving. This was not a farmers' poll. It was conducted by the Harris organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. DOLE. I ask for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield the Senator 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it seems to me that we have to make a choice, as the chairman just indicated. We did not have the luxury in the conference of a 1-year bill, a 2-year bill, or a 3-year bill. We were confined to 1 year.

We understand some of the problems raised by the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER). We understand some of the concerns expressed by the Senator from Iowa. But I think the record is very clear. It is not what we are going to do in conference. It is what we can do in conference. The President has made it clear that he will do one thing and one thing only, in addition to the so-called nine initiatives. He will raise the target price of wheat to $3.40. When Secretary Bergland suggested that it should $3.50, he got in trouble, and that has been all over the papers for the past few days.

It seems to me that as we close this debate, we should know that the cost is not $5.7 billion. We should understand what it costs the American farmer. He is a consumer, too. The American consumers are willing to pay more. We figure that this bill, for a family of four, would add between $40 and $65 a year to the grocery bill. Some would rather take it out of the Treasury, because that does not upset the consumer, and that was advocated in the conference. It was said:

> We don't like the Dole bill, because it comes out of the marketplace. It is easier to send the farmer a check.

The farmer does not want to be on welfare. He does not have a welfare mentality. But he has a budget. He does not have a budget committee, but he has a budget, and he is going broke. The bankers are foreclosing. Yet, scare tactics are being put forth, together with some figures which are not even proved.

I stood on this floor in 1975 and supported the act then, and my President vetoed it. I could read a lot of speeches made by my colleagues about that veto, what a terrible thing it was. If an emergency farm bill was needed in 1975 to help farmers, it certainly is necessary in 1978 to help farmers.

I would be glad to put somebody else's name on the bill, but keep in mind that there are the names of 22 other Senators. I see some in the Chamber: The distinguished Senators from South Carolina have actively supported this bill, as have those from Alabama, Arkansas, North Dakota, Nebraska. They are all sponsoring this approach. It is not a Republican proposal.

I say to my Democratic colleagues: Do not take it out on the American farmer, because the bill has my name on it. Simply because it has a Republican name on it, do not punish the American farmer, because it also has the names of Democrats and other Republicans and Independents.

The farmers want to stay in agriculture. It seems to this Senator that we have an opportunity now. If we fail, it is our responsibility. If the President fails, it is his responsibility.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, first of all, I shall make a brief comment on reports that I heard circulating over the weekend that the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Bergland, is considering resigning. I hope very much that those are nothing but rumors. I happen to think that Bob Bergland, who served for a number of years as a Member of the Congress of the United States, is personally totally dedicated to the best interests of American agriculture.

We know that every Secretary of Agriculture has to operate within certain constraints. They have to operate within the guidelines that are laid down by the President and by the Budget Bureau.

I am convinced in my own mind that if the Secretary of Agriculture had been permitted to do everything that he might personally have wanted to do to assist the farmer we might not be here today faced with the crisis that we have. But I hope farmers who get impatient with the slow pace of response to their needs will not blame that on the Secretary of Agriculture, specifically on Bob Bergland, and I hope he will stay on the job and continue to fight within the councils of the administration for the strongest possible farm program.

The program now before us is not exactly the kind of bill that I wish we were voting on today, but it is one that I can support. It is a program that has the merit of literally coming out of the grass roots of this country. I think Senators, regardless of what State they come from, must have great admiration for the way in which this legislation was brought to our attention. It really grew out of the efforts of the farmers themselves. I think it does have some limitations to it. It does have some problems. But, on balance, it is addressed at the very serious crisis that faces us in rural America today, and that is the absence of enough income to keep our family farms operating.

We had a little colloquy here on the floor earlier with the chairman of the Budget Committee, who is rightfully concerned about the impact of anything we do on the Federal budget and on the Federal deficit, but I suggest again here the point that I tried to make earlier that there are other options open to us, to keep the budget limitations in line.

We are going to be faced with a vote on a $25 billion tax cut, and when that time comes I intend to move, and I hope other Senators will join with me, to reduce that tax cut by whatever amount we need to cover the cost of this farm program. I do not want to see the cost of the legislation added to the Federal deficit. And that is the reason I intend to oppose at least part of this tax cut. There are other aspects of that tax cut that ought to be proposed to free up funds that we need for other purposes.

I also think, Mr. President, that we need to look very critically at other aspects of the budget that are coming to us. I thought frankly when the President submitted a $126 billion military budget to Congress this year, which is about $10 billion above what we were spending last year, that that offered some opportunity for a modest cut in the President's budget that we could have diverted to agriculture or to the creation of jobs in our cities. Instead of that, it is my understanding that the Senate Budget Committee added almost another $2 billion on top of the Pentagon request as it came to that committee.

When that bill comes back to the floor we will have an opportunity to look at it and to perhaps transfer some of those funds to cover the cost of this bill.

I also want to speak very directly to the point that Senator TALMADGE was making here earlier about the impact of this bill on consumers. We need to keep in mind that if Congress fails to act to deal with the crisis that now confronts the family farmers of this country, those farmers in a very short period of time are going to be replaced with corporations and then we will see inflationary food prices. We know what has happened to the energy prices in this country over the last few years when they quadrupled in considerable part, because of the monopoly control that a few major oil-producing countries and major oil companies have over that industry. I do not want to see that happen to America. We now have more than 2.5 million commercial farmers competing with each other in a largely free economy to give us the most abundant low-priced supply of food that exists anywhere in the world, but if these farmers go broke and the small businessmen up and down the main streets who depend on them go broke we are taking one huge step in the direction of monopoly control of farm and food pricing that is going to be a dagger aimed at the heart of every consumer in this country.

So in a very real sense, a bill that is designed to put a reasonable price floor under the production of our family farmers is a bill designed to protect the consumers of this country. Even if one were to accept the estimates of the chairman of the Budget Committee that this bill will cost the average family of four $100 in increased food bills next year, and I am not sure those figures are right, that comes out to about 27 cents a day that the families of this country would be asked to pay in order to give justice to the American farmer. I cannot imagine any family that would begrudge the food producers of the country another 27 cents a day on their food bill, if these estimates are right, in order to save these families that work so hard on the land.

Mr. President, when I consider how hard farmers work, when I consider the gambles they take with the weather, with the market, with pests, with export and import changes, and with all the hazards that face our food producers on the land, it is enough to make a person weep about the difficulties that face them. So I am very hopeful that the Senate will recognize that we are acting in a perfectly proper way in the procedure that has been outlined by the chairman of the Agriculture Committee here today and that we will act on this legislation to bring some measure of justice to the food producers of this country.

THE FARM BILL, THE BUDGET, AND THE CONSUMER

Mr. President, I am, along with the rest of the Senate, generally reluctant to push for expenditures which exceed the budgetary recommendations of the Budget Committee. My feeling is that whenever possible we should try to remain within those limits necessary to retain a reasonable hold on the deficit.

However, there are no decisions we make that are not and indeed should not be subject to review and amendment when extraordinary circumstances alter the assumptions under which we made our original decision.

I believe such is the case with the conference report now before us. While it may not be the final form I would have preferred, it is one I can support. The severity of the farm situation has been brought home to all of us in the last several weeks. This legislation is necessary if our food producers are to receive an adequate return on their investments. We must act to protect our own long-term food needs as well as those of the millions in the world who rely upon us for their sustenance.

But, Mr. President, the special point that I would like to make this morning is that this legislation need not add 1 cent to the national deficit.

If we adopt a proposal that I will make in greater detail shortly, this legislation and several other measures absolutely vital to the long-term economic health of our country will be paid for in lieu of the $25 billion tax cut proposal that the President has made. The tax cut will not do the job we need done. It is painting with a broad brush a structure that needs three coats in some spots and no paint in others.

Mr. President, we can invest that same $25 billion in a much more specific and useful way. There are sectors of our economy that are in desperate straits and deserve our focus. A simple tax cut, intended to lift the entire economic picture and thereby lift along with it the lagging sectors, will no longer do. Stagflation is a new phenomenon and requires new imaginative remedies. The tax cut was always just one tool in our arsenal, and a useful one, but it never alone sufficed, and certainly cannot be expected now to do the whole job of picking up our economy.

My proposal would be called the Economic Defense Act of 1978 and would take the $25 billion intended to be thrown into the entire economy and earmark it for the following specific purposes:

First, $6 billion to pay for the first year of the agriculture measure now before us and and to expand our Food For Peace program. Polls show the willingness of the American consumer to support the farmers in a way that allows them to meet their production costs. This bill will do that. The tax cut will not.

Second, $7 billion to pay for the social security program, instead of increasing a regressive payroll tax that would dampen both consumer power and business profits. The joint economic committee reported earlier in the year, and I quote, "increasing payroll taxes will lead to slower economic growth, higher unemployment, and faster rates of inflation than alternative means of financing". I voted against against the payroll increase approach, and many have come to the same conclusion in the intervening weeks. But the social security system is absolutely integral to our economic and social well being, and must be reinforced immediately. We can legislate this support, and in turn keep alive and healthy a program that tens of millions absolutely need. The tax cut could not do the same.

Third, provide the $12 billion necessary to meet the problems of structural unemployment, inadequate shelter, the lack of reliable and accessible transportation in our cities, and to develop a job-creating, inflation-fighting solar energy program. The President's urban policy proposal is an adequate beginning. But it is severely undercommitted in these areas. The cities cannot be ignored without all of us losing in the end. Beyond this the total commitment of funds to solar, wind and biomass development is now only a meager 3 percent of the Department of Energy Budget.

At the same time we have to put the country to work, not only because work is the most basic of rights, but because economic recovery will never happen without full employment. The surest long term answer to inflation is full employment. We have many underutilized sectors of the economy, but the most glaring is the still too ample supply of unemployed labor in all categories.

The tax cut cannot be targeted on the groups that need jobs. Further, the creation of one job through a tax cut costs the Government four times more than creating one public service job. Obviously a tax cut will not make the optimum use of scarce resources and maximize the cost/benefit of our investment. We will create just as many jobs in the private sector by taking the same amount and investing directly in a program of job creation, and do the whole economy more good at the same time. That is an incredible imbalance—one we cannot allow to continue. We cannot hope to rise from the quicksand of stagflation unless we use the sun and the wind to lift us. Nuclear development is not the only answer. There is not only much organized opposition to it, but its development creates relatively few jobs or trade possibilities. No tax cut can address this national priority.

What can be in the greater long term interests of all Americans, a quick heating up of an already overheated economy, or the development of a true energy independence, creating millions of new jobs in the process? A national initiative to develop and utilize our renewable resoures is totally consistent with the administration's stated energy goals, but it will not happen without an investment. The fact that we can ease unemployment, reduce the trade deficit, and dampen inflation should make such an initiative automatically part of a new public agenda, one that will in the future make it unnecessary to resort to continual tampering and halfway measures, each of which must be repeated each year, with dwindling returns.

Mr. President, the conference report we are considering today as well as the other measures I have mentioned can be accomplished without increasing the Federal deficit.

Indeed, unless we get to full employment, allow our food producers the freedom to meet their costs, reduce the payroll taxes of the working person, put people to work, and develop safe, clean, and reliable sources of alternative energy, the Federal deficit will grow, inflation will increase, business confidence will erode, and future generations will be faced with permanent and overwhelming problems. I believe this kind of new public agenda is the more prudent approach.

We do not need to transfer a little bit of money to everyone, when the same amount more thoughtfully earmarked would do each of us more good in the medium and long run. I believe the American people want and are willing to pay for an economically secure future. It is our job to help them get it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield one-half minute to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I am very distressed by this conference report and the general political atmosphere that dominates recent discussion of farm policy.

Let me begin by saying that I voted for flexible parity along with the approaches offered by Senators HERMAN TALMADGE and GEORGE MCGOVERN. I supported flexible parity because I wanted to give the conferees wide latitude in their efforts to make a workable emergency farm bill.

I am deeply worried about this bill's implications for feed supplies and for our export markets. In my home State of North Carolina, we have strong poultry, pork, and dairy industries. These farmers must have adequate supplies of feed.

On the other hand, we have price depressing surpluses. Flexible parity gives the individual farmer the opportunity to decide how much land to set-aside in return for a payment level that is sufficient for his operation.

I believe that flexible parity will help reduce supplies. I can only hope that this will happen without damage to our feed supplies or to our export markets.

There is little question that our Nation's farmers are in serious financial straights and that something must be done to reverse this situation.

If not, agriculture will suffer. And since agriculture is the backbone of this great Nation, our Nation will suffer.

While I am troubled in the conference report, I must have confidence in the judgment and experience of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, Senator TALMADGE.

Mr. President, we must also remember one other point of deepest concern, the rising age of American farmers. As we know, the average farmer today in this great country is 53 years old. We must do something to attract the young and able to enter farming and take on the risks of weather and pests.

Clearly, our current farm programs do not provide adequate inducement for the young to take up this risky enterprise.

We have heard that the President will veto this measure. This troubles me greatly, but I see no program that offers the necessary movement forward. If the President vetoes this bill, I hope that he is ready to bring up a program in its place.

Mr. BELLMON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine has the floor.

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I have 4 minutes remaining. I yield those minutes to my good friend from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. BELLMON. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Maine.

Mr. President, I have been a Member of the Senate since 1969. When I came here I was appalled at the very wasteful methods the Senate used in spending taxpayers' dollars. I had come from being Governor of a State where we had a requirement that we have a balanced budget. It was hard to believe how careless we were here in the way we spent the billions of dollars at our disposal. Since I have been here we have added another $350 or $400 billion to the national deficit and, partially due to the action of this body, we have seen inflation rise to the double-digit level, and this kind of activity hurts everyone in the country, farmers as well as consumers, country people as well as city people

The one hopeful sign that has developed during these years has been the development of the budget process. It is the only effective means, as has been brought out, that might some day bring our Federal spending processes into line and cause us to be more responsible in the way we spend our taxpayers' money.

The process has worked fairly well, whether it has been dealing with welfare, defense, housing, or any other function. But this is the first time it has been frontally attacked and threatened by a motion to suspend the budget process and, in effect, put the law into abeyance.

I would strongly oppose this new development. It will refuse the opportunity for us to give careful consideration to the full impact of this bill, and it will cause, I think, a return to the old free spending days of the past.

As many in the Chamber know, the authorizing committees have made recommendations this year that would result in a budget deficit not of $60.6 billion, as the President recommends, but more like $80 billion or $90 billion. If we allow the authorizing committees to bring this legislation without budget consideration, it is going to get us into an even worse inflation and worse budget position than we have been in.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Brad Gungoll of my staff, Jim Range of Senator BAKER's staff, and Bill Stringer and Bob Boyd of the Budget Committee staff be granted privileges of the floor during the consideration of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time has expired.

Mr. LEAHY. I understand there was another minute and a half remaining. The Senator from Oklahoma was told he had 4 minutes for his speech, and he has used 2½ minutes of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask for half a minute.

Mr. LEAHY. If the Senator from Oklahoma will yield a minute——

Mr. BELLMON. I am happy to yield 1 minute to the Senator from Vermont and a half minute to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I listened to the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) say that the Harris poll showed that the majority of farmers favored this farm bill.

I hope the Senator will also recall that the Harris poll shows that the majority of Americans are in favor of the Panama Canal Treaty.

Mr. President, since joining the Senate I have been a consistent and strong supporter of the American family farmer. My record on the Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry Committee is evidence of my commitment to the farmers. Therefore, it is with regret that I must vote against this farm bill. I do this knowing that quite possibly Senator CLARK and I will be on the only Agriculture Committee members to oppose it.

The reason I oppose this "farm bill" is not because I am changing my convictions in any way. I am opposing this price support bill because I believe it is the wrong approach. H.R. 6782, the so-called flexible-parity bill, is directed toward reducing grain supply by paying farmers higher deficiency payments for growing less grain.

I object to this approach of supporting farm prices. I have deep philosophical problems with any measure which pays farmers to idle their land. I believe my view opposing paid set-aside is shared by a great portion of the American people. The American public is committed to supporting the farmers of the Nation. They will support us in our efforts to provide a fair return to the farmer for his goods. However, I fear they will not understand paying for not growing and will be less willing to support any farm program in the future.

In addition to my philosophical objections, I believe that massive paid set-asides are too much of a gamble to take. The reduction of stocks by the quantities foreseen in this bill leaves us very vulnerable to the vagaries of weather.

If after such a large cutback of planting we have a major crop shortfall here in the United States or anywhere in the world, the food and feed prices will skyrocket.

In such a situation a dollar or two a bushel jump in prices is conceivable. Such an increase in so short a period of time would be devastating for our livestock and poultry industry. In addition, the inflationary impact would be seriously disruptive to our economy.

Such diminished resources would have the greatest impact in human terms. If we have a serious shortfall after reducing our stocks, it would be painfully felt by those in greatest need—the hungry and malnourished of this country and the world. Finally, the cost of the bill to the U.S. Treasury is enormous.

Opposing any paid set-aside does not mean I oppose income supports for farmers. It merely means I support a different approach, an approach that could be followed out through the present legislation that we have, legislation that has not been given an opportunity to work.

I support measures to provide a farmer a reasonable return for his crop. I believe we should raise farm target and loan supports so they more accurately reflect the cost of production and I have supported these higher levels.

I support the paying of higher deficiency payments because they do not affect our buffer stocks. If we experienced a serious shortfall, we might have sufficient stocks to see us through without serious disruption to the other segments of the farm sector and to our economy.

Therefore, Mr. President, because the flexible parity bill would pay farmers not to grow, would significantly reduce our stocks and make us vulnerable to the vagaries of weather, and would be highly costly and inflationary, I plan to vote against the measure.

I agree with President Carter's intention to veto this bill because we have not given the legislation on the books adequate opportunity to work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. PERCY. Having spent 3 years together with Senator Ervin and Senator Muskie helping to create the Budget Act, and having observed its workings and its ability to put a hold on inflation in this country, the promise of it would be destroyed, I think, if we went ahead with this farm program.

In 1974 we passed the Congressional Budget Reform Act—an achievement I consider to be one of the most important actions taken by the Congress in many years. The hope of those of us who were active in the budget reform process' creation was that it would lead to priority setting for expenditures and also holding down spending. Although in absolute terms, one cannot say that the new process has reduced Government spending, I certainly think a good case can be made that Government spending would be considerably higher without the rigorous analysis that the new process puts proposed expenditures through.

However, disturbing signs began to set into the process last year and may be continuing this year. That is, the Congress seems to be willing now on an increasing basis to vote for waivers of the Budget Act, thus placing the major tenets of the process in jeopardy. We must all support the budget process to the fullest extent possible, as only through this process can Congress really set priorities, hold down spending, and thus hold down inflation. The budget process is our most important congressional tool to set national priorities and control inflation—we must preserve its sanctity.

Mr. President, on Tuesday, March 21, the Senate passed by a substantial margin the Emergency Agricultural Act of 1978 to help farmers through the financial squeeze they are presently facing. At that time, I felt Senator TALMADGE's "land diversion" provision, which would have provided incentives for farmers to withdraw additional land from production, was the best piece of legislation the Senate could have passed to help farmers and yet still protect consumers from increasing food costs.

I favored the Talmadge 1-year provision despite the fact that I do not generally favor setting aside land from production because I believed a set-aside program is needed for the 1978 crop year so that we can get the supply and demand of our grains back into balance.

I was disappointed when the Senate decided to attach the McGovern amendment and the Dole "flexible parity" amendment to the "land diversion" bill. I opposed these amendments to the Talmadge bill. Despite the fact that the McGovern and Dole amendments were attached to the Talmadge bill I voted for final passage of the Emergency Agricultural Act of 1978 in order to give the House-Senate conferees as much leeway as possible to formulate and report out a rational, well thought out farm bill.

Unfortunately, contrary to expectations, this was not the result. The conference committee has reported out what I consider to be an irresponsible, inflationary, multibillion-dollar farm bill. The conferees eliminated the original 1 year "land diversion" provision and kept the costly and inflationary Dole "flexible parity" provision intact.

According to the Congressional Budget Office, this legislation will add at least 2 percent to retail food costs on top of the projected 6 to 8 percent under current policy. The administration estimates this bill will cost $6 billion more than the more modest land diversion plan President Carter put into effect last week to to firm up farm prices. Finally, the Consumer Price Index will rise an additional 1 percent as a direct result of this legislation.

Not only is the conference bill costly and inflationary, it drastically increases Government intervention in farm programs, jeopardizes our foreign agricultural export program which is so vital to the country, as well as to farmers, and interferes with the competitive free-market system that I believe Illinois farmers prefer. Mr. President, it is my philosophy that the best way to improve farm income is by creating and expanding domestic and foreign demand for our agricultural commodities. We should avoid increased Government regulation that could make American farm product prices uncompetitive in world markets. Our goal should be to double farm exports from $24 billion to $50 billion over the next few years and strengthen, not weaken, our position as a reliable, stable source of farm products to the world.

In addition to the inflationary nature of this bill, I oppose it because it makes no sense to me to totally restructure the whole 4-year Federal farm program enacted only 7 months ago. The Secretary of Agriculture has the authority to implement the measures included in the Talmadge bill. The new program announced by the Secretary last week is a good start and I urge the administration to improve upon it.

For these reasons I will vote against waiving the Budget Act and against the conference report. If this legislation is sent to the President, I trust he will veto it and I will vote to sustain that veo.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I support the conference report on the Emergency Agricultural Act of 1978. I do not think there is any question about the fact that farmers and ranchers in this country are in serious trouble. In my state of Wyoming, the seriousness of the problem is illustrated by the fact that net income per farm plummeted from $14,788 in 1973 to a paltry $241 in 1976. Moreover, when farmers and ranchers are hurting as they have been in recent years, their problems become the problems of the communities which depend on a healthy agricultural industry for existence. I believe farmers and ranchers deserve some help.

This legislation undoubtedly is not perfect, and it is not the kind of program I could support on a long-term basis. It is a temporary, 1-year program designed to help farmers and ranchers get back on their feet. And it is a vastly better approach than that taken by the administration, which has fiddled around and twiddled its thumbs, failing altogether to do anything to deal with the problem.

Congress gave the administration authority in last year's farm bill to take certain steps that would have helped relieve the problem, but did the administration use this authority? No. It sat idly by, doing nothing. Then, at the 11th hour after the Senate had already passed a farm bill and the conference committee was about to act, the administration announced revisions in its farm program. The day after the newspaper carried stories about the administration's new farm policy, a member of my staff telephoned the Department of Agriculture's Congressional Liaison Office for details of the program. None was available. We asked for information about the administration's new program so that we could respond to questions from farmers. Information was promised, but as of right now, it still has not been received.

Further, Mr. President, I am most annoyed and disturbed by recent reports that the Carter administration's answer to inflation is to take steps to force down farm prices. The farmers' conviction that Washington is out to get them certainly is not diminished by rumors that the administration wants to bring in more foreign meat to push down domestic prices. The livestock industry has just gone through a 3-year period of the worst prices since the depression years. And now that things are looking up a bit, what happens? The bureaucrats start talking about bringing in more imports. Livestock producers have not asked the Government for subsidies, but they do ask that Government refrain from deliberately ruining their chances for economic recovery by inviting in cheap foreign competition.

The recommendation that more foreign meat be imported to depress domestic livestock prices came from Barry Bosworth, Chairman of the Council on Wage and Price Stability. A few days ago, Mr. Bosworth sent me a copy of the Council's quarterly report on the state of our economy. The report had this to say about food prices:

> The importance of imported food items is also evident in the sharp swing in food prices between the first and last half of 1977. In the first six months the inflation of total food prices returned to double-digit levels, while the prices of domestically produced food rose by a more modest 7.4 per cent at annual rates. Imported food prices increases accounted for over half of the 14.3 per cent rise in prices for food consumed at home.

The report goes on to say that for the 10-year period between 1967 and 1977, "Retail prices of imported foods rose substantially more than prices of domestically produced farm products—11.1 versus 6.2 percent annually."

Mr. President, the Carter administration intends to make agriculture the whipping boy for inflation, and I, for one, intend to do everything I can to see that the President does not get away with it. Farmers are not responsible for inflation. They are victims of it. Let the President launch the battle against inflation in the Federal bureaucracy where opportunities for cutting costs abound. Let him make good on his campaign promises to cut down on the size and cost of the Federal bureaucracy and the expense of Federal rules and regulations.

● Mr. McINTYRE. Mr. President, I intend to vote against the conference report on H.R. 6782, which I regard as an inflationary, expensive and possibly even unnecessary measure. I do so with mixed feelings, for I have listened to the farmers who have visited here since the start of this year and I can sympathize with their frustration and concern for the future. Although New Hampshire is not now a primarily agricultural State, farming and agriculture run deep in the roots of the history of my State and of the heritage of its residents.

Nevertheless, I cannot in good conscience vote for a measure as irresponsible and potentially dangerous as this one. This bill, if enacted into law, could add nearly $6 billion to the Federal budget, not to speak of its impact on the food budgets of working people. It would further accelerate food price inflation, which is already moving ahead at twice the rate of the rest of the economy, to double-digit levels. With the planting season almost upon us, this bill also opens the door to considerable confusion among farmers trying to decide what and how much to plant this year. Significantly reduced production this year could also lead the way to food shortages and severe price inflation in future years in the event of a drought or bad weather of the sort that we have experienced more and more often in recent years.

Finally, recent agricultural data supports the administration's contention that last year's farm bill is working. Farm income is up and has increased during each of the past 6 months. Let us give these programs time to work instead of rushing in to spend billions of dollars which may not be needed.

This is a well-intentioned bill but, nevertheless, a bad one. I am going to vote against it and, if it is approved by both chambers of Congress, I will urge President Carter to veto it.●

● Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the Senate should approve the conference report for the following reasons:

First, economic: Farmers need a shot in the arm. Despite the fact that prices have gone up a little in the last few months, farm income is down a third since 1973. No other segment of the economy has had to undergo such duress.

When income to farmers is increased, the multiplier effect is felt throughout the country like no other economic stimulus. In Montana there are about 25,000 farms. Assuming four people per farm, there are 100,000 people who make their living directly from farms. In Montana, at a rough estimate, another three to four jobs depend directly on the farmer. That is another 75,000 to 100,000 jobs, and at four people per family, another 300,000 to 400,000 people dependent on farm income.

In the United States there are some 2.75 million farms. If the same statistics hold true for the rest of the country, there are some 40-plus million people who depend directly or indirectly on farms in this country. That is a lot of people who would get a big boost in income from a relatively small investment.

Second, equity: In 1973 farmers received a record $30 billion for their products. This year it will be in the neighborhood of $20 billion. In 1973, for the first time in many years, farmers began to get their heads above water and were able to start reinvesting in equipment and land. No longer are these opportunities available. People in rural areas deserve a reasonable standard of living, too.

This is a 1-year program. It is not perfect. It can be amended next year. But it is needed now, for this year, if it is to do any good.●

● Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the conference report on H.R. 6782. I believe that opposition to the report is in the best interests of the farm community both in Tennessee and throughout the Nation.

I am sure each of us in the Senate have talked with and been visited by many farmers in the last few months. Most of these farm groups made a simple and realistic request: First, that the Congress promptly approve legislation addressing their immediate economic plight and second, that Congress as expeditiously as possible begin work on longer term agricultural legislation that would prevent similar crises in the future.

The conference report we are asked to approve today attempts to address the first of these requests but in my opinion fails to do so. Mr. President, it should be apparent that if the Congress seeks to provide short-term emergency relief, the legislation to achieve this goal must be straightforward and easily implementable and have a relatively predictable impact on the farm situation. The legislation before us today, however, is extremely complex and judging from studies I have examined will have a practically unpredictable impact. In addition to these flaws, the conference bill, if it is to be effective at all, should have been passed months ago. The present conflict over this legislation virtually assures that all the crops affected by the terms of this legislation will have been planted before the date of enactment. This of course means that even if the President were to approve this bill it would be almost humanly impossible to administer it in time to do much good for our farmers' short-term problems.

Finally, there seem to be two other disturbing impacts of the "flexible parity" bill. It has been estimated by the Agriculture Department and our own congressional budget office that the cost of this emergency bill could be phenomenal, possibly adding as much as $6 billion to our already strained Federal budget. CBO also reports that this legislation could cost the average American family from $100 to $200 during 1978. This will most certainly create undue hardships on certain classes of consumers who are themselves in a budget squeeze already.

Mr. President, I oppose the flexible parity concept as a short-term solution to our farm problems when this measure was initially on the Senate floor a few weeks ago. I did, however, vote in favor of final passage of a combined farm bill in the hope that the conference committee would devise an easily implementable, effective short-term farm program from the options available to them. The legislation we are asked to approve today does not meet these expectations either for my farmers in Tennessee or for those of the Nation.

Since the time left in which to help the farmers during this session is short and since the Congress is likely to approve only one piece of short-term legislation, I urge the conferees to reconsider this report and to work with the conferees from the other body to design a bill that will reasonably address the immediate plight of our farmers.●

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, the Senate has the opportunity today to offer needed incentives for our agricultural sector. When we considered the 1977 farm legislation, I felt that we did not provide ample stimuli for that sector of our economy which feeds and clothes the people of this Nation and much of the world. In my view, this is one of the many reasons why we are considering emergency legislation at this time.

During both Senate and House consideration of Public Law 95–113, there were pressures from all sides and at many levels being applied to thwart the desire of the Congress to provide financial stability for our producers of agricultural commodities.

As we consider the conference report on H.R. 6782, once again we are plagued by these same pressures. I commend my colleagues in the Senate for their tenacity in designing comprehensive emergency legislation which will furnish farmers throughout this country with the means to continue meeting the needs of our people.

The flexible parity concept embodied in this legislation represents an embarkation on a new course for agricultural policy, one which may result in forming the foundation for agricultural legislation in the future.

Mr. President, in my view, we have admirably responded to the needs of our Nation's most basic industry. We are on the brink of providing management tools for agricultural producers which they have heretofore not had, but which they have sorely needed. It is my hope that this legislation will not only yield assistance during this year, but that it will strengthen the agricultural sector, and in turn, all other segments of our economy.

I urge my colleagues to lend their support to the legislation which is now under consideration. It is also my hope that serious consideration will be given to designing a long-range agricultural policy which will eliminate the need for emergency legislation on this sort in the future.

Agriculture has a tremendous influence on the economic, social, and political affluence of America and the world. The fate of this legislation will be significant in determining whether we have an adequate supply of food and fiber, and whether adequate resources will be available to produce these needs in the years ahead. Whether or not agricultural producers achieve progress and prosperity with efficiency and equity depends on decisions we make today.●

● Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, the Senate should reject the conference report and direct its conferees to return with a sound bill that can be signed by the President. The game the Congress has been playing at the expense of the farmer should end here and now.

When this bill came to the floor 3 weeks ago we could have passed the Talmadge proposal. It was a reasonable emergency measure. It could have been approved promptly and signed by the President. Farmers would have had the assurance of help within days. Instead, the Senate took the easy way, adding the Dole amendment to the Talmadge bill to create a monstrosity.

Unlike the farmers watching from the gallery that day, most Members knew that the bill we were sending to conference could not become law. It was a disaster for the Federal budget, inflationary, damaging to our farm export markets and an unacceptable risk to world food supplies. Perhaps some who voted for the Talmadge-Dole combination were relying on the conference committee to repair the damage. Unfortunately, the conferees declined to perform the surgery. We cannot give this version a clean bill of health.

The President has given fair warning that he will veto the bill in its current form. He will have no choice if the Congress refuses to act responsibly. Moreover, it is doubtful that a veto could be overridden.

Mr. President, some of those who profess the liveliest concern for the plight of the farmer have wasted weeks at his expense. They have raised false hopes and false political heroes and villains. They have constructed a bill that totally ignores economic reality. But they have done nothing for the farmer. While there is still time we ought to reconsider and produce a bill that will serve both the immediate and long-term interests of the farmer in a decent income through reasonable production controls and support levels. The bill should be returned to conference with instructions.

The Congress must then promptly take up a measure to ease credit terms for the farmer caught in financial crisis and to provide export terms that will enable the American farmer to compete successfully in expanding world markets.●

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Senator BARTLETT on the conference report.

The PRESIDENT OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BARTLETT

For months experts in agriculture have been saying that the powers contained in the 1976 Agriculture Act, and other federal statutory authorizations, could be used by the Administration to assist in the recovery of American agriculture.

The individual farmers of this nation asked for help, and waited, expecting positive actions on the part of their government. Because of continuing delays and denials, certain groups began to make proposals and many members of Congress began to seek the Administration's assistance.

The Administration refused, a refusal that echoed the earlier opposition to the 1976 Act. As these refusals continued the farmers became motivated to seek the only alternative left to them, that being a change in the existing statute to force the Administration to assist them.

The problems of the nation's farmers were clear to the Senators from agricultural states, and through the efforts of direct contact by individual farmers with non-farm state Senators, the Senate became increasingly aware of the urgent need to make a change.

The result of the inaction by the Administration, and the direct action by farmers, is the conference report we are considering today. I support this legislation because of the extreme need, and the fact that I believe that it will assist, but I regret to admit that we had to resort to this course of action in the same Congress that earlier passed major agricultural legislation.

It is not the farmers' responsibility to physically come to Washington to get their problems resolved. In this representative form of government, both the legislative and executive branches are supposed to be sensitive to react to problems in various sectors of our economy.

I realize that much of the business community has learned the hard way that they have to seek an "audience" in Washington to have their voices heard. This actually is a failure of our system, and now the failure has spread to the extent that thousands of individual farmers have had to leave their farms and seek assistance from their depressed state by personal efforts in Washington.

The fight is not over for the farmers. The opposition to this legislation is being mustered rapidly, and the Administration continues to pronounce its opposition. The one consolation is that the farmers are also learning quickly, and are not likely to give up their efforts.

Because of the Administration's opposition and inaction, a whole new group of citizens has been trained in the procedures of government, and I do not believe that they are likely to let these lessons go unused.

Mr. President, I would like to again state my support for H.R. 6782, and encourage my colleagues to continue their support.

COMMENTS REGARDING THE VOTE ON THE FARM BILL

When debate in the Senate first began last March 21, I was fully prepared to work for and vote for the original proposal by Senator TALMADGE. That was the legislation that farm group after farm group told me they wanted to see become law. I realize that a number of farmers are being squeezed between low farm prices and high debt payments. I wanted very much to help them through this difficult time by passage of legislation that provided immediate assistance through higher loan and target prices, and a sensible set-aside program.

However, during the debate on the original Talmadge proposal, amendments by Senators MCGOVERN and DOLE were added to the original Talmadge bill—escalating the cost of the final legislation several times over the original version and far beyond what the Nation, as both consumers and taxpayers, should be required to bear. I was unable to vote for this final composite of TALMADGE, DOLE, and MCGOVERN, because it violated our budget limits and would have added significantly to the Federal deficit. The cost of that total combined program, as discussed on the floor, was projected at $8 to $10 billion, as compared to the $1.2 billion cost of the original Talmadge bill.

The conference report voted on today suffers the same defect. Costs of that bill were estimated at $5.7 billion—almost $12 billion over a 2-year period—$5.7 billion, when farmers themselves had repeatedly expressed acceptance and adequacy of the $1.2 billion Talmadge program. Even though this second proposal was less expensive than the bill that passed the Senate 3 weeks ago, the vote was much closer—49 to 41 in favor of the conference report as compared to 67 to 26 in favor of the Senate bill. I believe this means many Senators are becoming more concerned about expensive Federal programs.

President Carter has already announced he will veto this bill, because of its inflationary nature and its bureaucratic unworkability. Thus, by passing a bill which the President will not sign into law, the Senate may delay providing the badly needed assistance which would now be going out to farmers under the original Talmadge proposal, which I supported then, and would still support now.

It is my hope that if the House passes this bill, any Presidential veto message clearly states what kind of a farm bill the President will sign into law. Then the Congress can get to work quickly and still pass reasonable and well thought out legislation in time to assist farmers in making planting decisions in the next few weeks. Together, the Congress and the President can provide needed legislation which will speed assistance to the greatest need.

I will work for and support such a proposal to help the farmer.●

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FORD). Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, Calendar No. 2, which the clerk will state.

The clerk will suspend and the Senate will come to order. The balconies will help the Senate.

The clerk will proceed.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, the Panama Canal Treaty.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now consider amendment No. 38 by the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH).

The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Panama Canal Treaty contains a number of provisions which provide for substantial payments to the Republic of Panama. Article III, section 5 of the treaty provides that the newly formed Panama Canal Commission shall pay the Republic of Panama $10 million per year to reimburse it for providing certain public services in the canal operating area, such as police and fire protection, garbage collection, and street maintenance. Likewise, article XIII, section 4 of the treaty provides that the Republic of Panama shall receive from the Commission certain additional payments "to be paid out of Canal operating revenues."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. There is noise in the galleries.

Will the Senator suspend until the galleries have been cleared? The interruption is by the spectators, if the Senator will just bear with me until we have order.

The Senator may proceed.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Chair.

Three separate payments are contemplated under this provision: First, an unspecified annual payment computed at a rate of thirty hundredths of a U.S. dollar ($0.30) per Panama Canal net ton, or its equivalency, for each vessel transiting the canal for which tolls are charged, such payment to be adjusted upwards to reflect changes in the U.S. wholesale price index; second, a fixed annuity of $10 million; and third, a supplemental annual payment up to $10 million, the exact amount to be determined by the amount of surplus revenues of the commission. It is estimated that these payments to Panama will total more than $60 million in the first year of operation, excluding the supplemental payment drawn from surplus revenues.

The language of the treaty does not indicate whether these payments to Panama shall be made in accordance with the legislative processes of Congress. Indeed, representatives of the State Department testifying before Congress have emphasized that the canal will be self-supporting under the treaty, and that all payments to Panama will be derived from operating revenues. In other words, the impression we have been given is that legislative appropriations will not be necessary, because these payments will be made directly to Panama by the Commission.

This impression has been confirmed by the language of the proposed implementing legislation that has been submitted by the State Department. The implementing legislation would amend section 2 of title 2 of the Panama Canal Code by adding a new subsection (H) reading as follows:

(H) Payments by the Commission to the Republic of Panama for providing public services in accordance with paragraph (5) of article III of the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977 shall be treated for all purposes as an operating cost of the Commission.

In other words, Mr. President, these payments are not going to be treated as separate payments requiring an appropriation by Congress, but as part of the operating costs of the Commission, thereby bypassing the legislative process. The implementing legislation drafted by the State Department further provides that subsection (g) of section 62 of title 2 of the Panama Canal Code shall be amended to provide that—

The Panama Canal Commission shall pay directly from Canal operating revenues to the Republic of Panama those payments required under paragraph 4 of Article XIII of the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977.

The obvious objective here is to bypass the appropriations process of the Congress in connection with payments to Panama under the treaty.

Mr. President, this scheme, on its face, is constitutionally and financially defective. In the first place, it violates the Constitution. In the second place, it seems certain that there will not be sufficient revenue to cover all of these payments, and that Congress will have to make up the difference through appropriations anyway.

Article I, section 9 of the Constitution provides that—

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in Consequence of Appropriations made by law.

Moreover, article I, section 7 provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. It is a well-established principle of our Constitution that the treatymaking power of the Chief Executive is limited by Congress' power over the purse. Simply stated—and even State Department representatives acknowledge this rule—a treaty cannot appropriate funds.

TREATIES AND EXPENDITURE OF FUNDS

The Panama Canal Commission, according to article III, section 3 of the treaty, will "carry out its responsibilities" as "a U.S. Government agency," and it "shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America." Thus the treaty contemplates that a U.S. Government agency will be making payments to a foreign government for the remainder of this century without the consent of the House of Representatives and in derogation of the appropriations processes of the House and Senate. This clearly raises an important constitutional issue. The administration's view is that many provisions of this treaty are self-executing, meaning that they take effect as domestic law without further action by Congress. But are these provisions of the treaty providing for payments by a U.S. Government agency self-executing in the light of article I, section 9, clause 7 of the Constitution, which gives Congress the exclusive power to make appropriations? The answer, I believe, is that they are not self-executing.

It is not disputed that the President's treatymaking power extends to bilateral agreements by which the United States undertakes to make payments of money. One of the first treaties made by the United States after the adoption of the Constitution, the Jay Treaty of 1794 with Great Britain, provided for payments of debts owed by American citizens to British creditors. The treaties with France for the acquisition of Louisiana provided for a payment of 60 million francs. Countless other examples could be cited to illustrate the principle that the Chief Executive has the authority to make treaties which obligate the United States to make payments to a foreign government. But I am not aware that any President has ever made a self-executing treaty providing for such payments.

EARLIER PRECEDENTS

Debate over the provisions of the Jay Treaty requiring the expenditure of funds is instructive in this regard. The Members of the House of Representatives did not question the right of the President to enter into such a treaty. Instead, they debated the issue of whether the House was entitled to obtain copies of the instructions given by the President to the negotiators, and whether the Congress was required to appropriate the funds necessary to carry the treaty into effect. President Washington rejected the demand of the House for copies of the instructions, but the House adopted a resolution, vigorously supported by James Madison, which provided that—

When a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of the Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the Constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such a treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as, in their judgement, may be most conducive to the public good.

Congress subsequently enacted a law making the necessary appropriations. The same principles were recognized and the same procedure was followed regarding subsequent treaties where payments were required.

In the case of Turner against Baptist Missionary Union, a Federal Circuit Court considered the effect of an 1863 treaty with an Indian tribe, which provided for payment of the net proceeds of the sale of 160 acres of land to the owner of the buildings situated on the land.

Said the Court:

A treaty under the Federal Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This, unquestionably, applies to all treaties, where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and cannot be the Supreme Law of the Land, where the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect. Until this power is exercised, as where the appropriations of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative, in the sense of the Constitution, as money cannot be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitations of our government. . . . As well might it be contended that an ordinary act of Congress, without the signature of the President, was a law, as that a treaty which engages to pay money, is in itself a law. . . . It [the treaty-making power] cannot bind or control the legislative action in this respect, and every foreign government may be presumed to know that as far as the treaty stipulates to pay money, the legislative action is required. (Fed. Cas. No. 14251 (1852), 24 Fed. Cas. 345, 346.).

In brief, the precedents, both political and constitutional, are well established that a treaty provision for the payment of money is not self-executing but requires an appropriation by Congress.

PAYMENT PROVISIONS OF THE NEW TREATY

This principle has been confirmed and duly respected in all previous treaties between the United States and the Republic of Panama. The treaty of 1903 provided under article XIV for an initial payment of $10 million and an annual payment of $250,000. Article VII of the 1936 treaty increased the amount of the annuity to 430,000 balboas, A third treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama in 1955 increased the annuity once again to 1,930,000 balboas. In each case, the payments were made under appropriations enacted by Congress; and it was never suggested that any of these treaties was self-executing. The current annual payment ($2,238,000) is shown as one of three permanent appropriations in the Department of State budget for fiscal year 1978.

The present treaty, of course, calls for payments by the Commission and it would thus appear that appropriations will not be necessary because no funds will be drawn from the U.S. Treasury. This understanding of the method of payment, however, ignores a number of important considerations. As I have previously noted, article III of the proposed treaty specifies that the Panama Canal Commission, a U.S. Government agency, "shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States." The laws of the United States governing the fiscal management of Government agencies in general are contained in title 31 of the United States Code. Executive departments and noncorporate Federal agencies are subject generally to the provisions of title 31, except the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act. Wholly owned Government corporations are subject to the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act and to many of the other provisions of title 31 as well.

Turning to title 31, we observe that it clearly delineates the fiscal responsibilities of Government agencies generally and their dependence on appropriations to authorize the expenditure of funds. The Budget and Accounting Act of 1921, which has been incorporated into title 31, defines "department or establishment" to include "any executive department, independent commission, board, bureau, office, agency, or other establishment of the Government," and the term "appropriations" to include funds and authorizations to create obligations by contract in advance of appropriations or "any other authority making funds available for obligation or expenditure." All moneys received from whatever source for the use of the United States are required to be paid into the Treasury (31 U.S.C. 484). Detailed provisions are made for submission of estimates for appropriations for expenditure by government agenices (31 U.S.C. 581–752Z). Expenditures in excess of appropriations are prohibited, and all appropriations or funds made available for obligation are required to be apportioned to avoid the necessity for deficiency or supplemental appropriation (31 U.S.C. 665).

In light of these requirements, the provision of the new treaty that the payments to Panama are to be made by the Panama Canal Commission is wholly contrary to article I of the Constitution and Federal law, unless it is assumed—and the language of the treaties does not seem to support such an assumption—that such funds must first be appropriated by Congress. Presumably no one would seriously contend that the effect of the constitutional provision limiting to Congress the power to make appropriations can be circumvented by the device of providing in the treaty that a payment without appropriations is to be made by a named government agency instead of the United States.

With respect to article III of the proposed treaty, then, it is abundantly clear, that the Panama Canal Commission cannot pay the Republic of Panama $10 million per annum in advance of legislative appropriations authorizing such expeditures. This is also true of the additional payments made by the Commission "out of canal operating revenues" under article XIII of the treaty. Why article III provides simply for payments and article XIII provides for payments "out of canal operating revenues" is a distinction that apparently has no significance regarding constitutional and statutory requirements. The "canal operating revenues" referred to in article XIII are presumably the "tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges" which the United States—not the Panama Canal Commission—is authorized to "Establish, modify, collect, and retain" by article III, section 2(c) of the treaty. These revenues, of course, are the same in kind as those that have been derived by the United States from the Panama Canal since it was first opened to commerce and which have been expended under appropriations by Congress since that time.

It may be that the purpose of making the payments "out of canal operating revenues" was to identify such payments as part of the cost of operation, in order to establish rates of tolls. Such a construction necessarily assumes, however, that revenues will be sufficient to cover both the payments to Panama and operating expenses over and above such payments. But this leaves unanswered the obvious question: what if there is a disparity between the amount of revenues and the total of such expenses? Is this deficiency to be absorbed by the U.S. Government by appropriations to cover losses, or by Panama through acceptance of less than the amount of payment stipulated by the treaty? In either case, the provision for payment out of revenues does not appear to affect the constitutional requirement for appropriations to carry these provisions into effect.

Section 4(c) of article XIII, which provides for payment of $10 million "out of canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission" not only runs headlong into present law requiring the agency operating the canal to pay surplus funds into the Treasury, but also substitutes Panama for the United States as the beneficiary of surplus funds. This would effectively preclude further reduction of the U.S. Government's investment in the canal. Like the provision of article XIII for annual payments based on the aggregate measurement tonnage of ships using the canal during the year, the qualifications introduced by section 4(c) relate solely to the determination of the amount of the payment. Neither provision recognizes nor makes mention of the need for congressional appropriations to authorize payment. To be sure, the payment provisions of the treaty seemingly attempt to provide permanent appropriations for the treaty payments, an objective prohibited by the constitutional rule that only Congress has the power to make appropriations.

In sum, the provisions of the proposed treaty for payment of money can not become effective as domestic law unless Congress has, in accordance with article I, section 9 of the Constitution, appropriated the necessary funds. Under the treaties with Panama now in effect, which also provide for annual payments to Panama, revenues derived from operation of the canal are treated as public moneys and expenditures of those funds are limited to those authorized by appropriation acts of Congress.

Neither the language of the treaties nor the testimony of State Department representatives, however, offers us any concrete, specific assurances that all of the payment provisions of the treaty will be implemented by appropriations of Congress. Although administration witnesses appearing before congressional committees have freely acknowledged that a treaty cannot appropriate funds, they have continued to insist that this is a self-executing treaty. Herbert Hansell, legal adviser to the State Department, has stated that there is "no ground" for the concern expressed by House Members that the treaty "could be regarded as a means of circumventing that constitutional provision with respect to the payments to be made to Panama under the treaty." Why? Because, he says:

> It is intended that the payments to be made to Panama be financed wholly from projected revenues, so as to avoid any need to resort to general revenues.

Mr. President, in all of the testimony that I have examined in connection with this treaty, I have nowhere seen a flat assertion by any representative of the State Department or the Department of Justice that this is a non-self-executing treaty that will require congressional appropriations in order to implement the payment provisions of the treaty; and the treaty itself is silent on this subject.

For these reasons, I offer this amendment to the treaty which would obviate this difficulty and eliminate all uncertainty and ambiguity about the method of payment to Panama. This amendment provides simply that under article III, section 5 of the treaty, all revenues of the Panama Canal Commission shall be deposited in the U.S. Treasury, and that all payments to Panama shall be based on legislative appropriations. It is necessary because of established constitutional precedents and laws governing Federal agencies.

PROJECTED DEFICIENCIES IN THE CANAL OPERATING COSTS UNDER THE NEW TREATY

Mr. President, it should further be noted, as I have previously indicated, that the future of the Panama Canal under this treaty, in so far as its financial structure is concerned, is rather bleak. In a recent study by Mr. W. M. Whitman, special consultant to the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries it is estimated that the cost of operating the canal during the first year of operation under the treaty will exceed revenues by approximately $99 million, not counting additional costs to the U.S. Treasury of $7.7 million. Mr. Whitman's analysis is based on a tabulation provided by the Panama Canal Company, and is adjusted to reflect the same elements of costs as those shown in the 1978 budget. It also includes additional treaty costs that are not part of the company's tabulation.

This study shows, Mr. President, it is illusory to think that the Panama Canal will be operating on a self-supporting basis, as the representatives of the State Department have insisted. Additional appropriations have to be made to make up the deficit, and cover the hidden costs of this treaty. This is not to mention the added economic burden, after the tolls increase, that the American people will have to bear under this treaty as a result of higher prices for materials, including Alaskan crude oil, that will be transiting the canal.

The American consumer is going to rue the day that our Senators ratify these treaties, because they are going to pay through the nose from that day forward as a result of the escalation in costs to every consumer in America as a result of these treaties and their ratification.

"If financial viability of the canal is equated to operation as a self-sustaining enterprise," Whitman concludes, "the venture appears to be doomed from the first year after the treaty goes into effect. This was the thrust of the testimony of all the witnesses who urged or suggested the necessity for absorption of elements of the cost of operation by the Treasury through elimination of interest and depreciation or abandonment of the concept of recovery of the investment of the Government in the canal. There may be reasons to support adoption of such expedients, but the policy of operating the canal on a self-sustaining basis is not one of them."

Mr. President, I urge all Senators to read this perceptive study with care, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, together with my amendment, at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT No. 38

In paragraph 3 of article III, at the end of the text immediately above subparagraph (a), add the following: "The operating revenues of the Panama Canal Commission shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States of America.".

In the first sentence of paragraph 5 of article III, strike out "Panama Canal Commission shall reimburse" and insert in lieu thereof "United States of America shall reimburse, only after the amount of such reimbursement has been appropriated,".

PANAMA CANAL TREATY PROBLEMS

The written statements and testimony presented by the various witnesses appearing at the hearing of the Panama Canal Subcommittee on November 30 and December 1, 1977, disclose several clearly identifiable problems of some concern to the Committee and the Congress in the consideration of the Panama Canal treaties and legislation to carry them into effect, assuming they are ratified. Those problems fall into five general categories, namely:

1. The projected deficiency in canal revenues to cover operating costs;
2. The sources of funds to cover the deficiency in canal revenues;
3. The form of the Government agency to be established to operate the canal;
4. Ambiguities in treaty provisions; and
5. Constitutional issues.

1. Canal revenue deficiency:

The negotiators and other proponents of the treaty repeatedly have stressed the proposition that under the treaty the operations of the canal are to be self-supporting and that canal revenues are to be used exclusively for payment of costs of the operation without cost to the U.S. taxpayer.

The treaty provides for annual payments to Panama totalling some $62 million in the first year of operation, exclusive of a contingent payment of an additional $10 million to be paid to the extent canal revenues exceed expenditures. Other provisions of the treaty transferring income-producing property to Panama will reduce the revenues of the Panama Canal by some $130 million, partially offset by a reduction of about $50 million in canal operating costs.

An analysis of Panama Canal revenues and costs in the first year of operation under the treaty in comparison to the estimate provided in the 1978 budget program, which does not include provision for the effect of the treaty, is attached. This analysis is based on a tabulation provided by the Panama Canal Company, adjusted to reflect the same elements of cost as those shown in the 1978 budget and to include additional treaty costs, so far identified, not included in the Company's tabulation. The analysis shows that in the first year of operation under the treaty, Panama Canal revenues will fail to cover costs of operation of the canal and related treaty costs by about $99 million exclusive of additional cost to the U.S. Treasury of $7.7 million. The recovery from canal revenues of operating expenses and all other treaty related costs would require an increase in rates of tolls of more than 60 percent. If the additional costs to the Treasury of $7.7 million, referred to above, are excluded from the calculation, the increase in rates of tolls required would be reduced to 56 percent.

Although the calculations of the insufficiency in Panama Canal revenues to cover expenses summarized above relate to the first year of operation, there is no basis for optimum that the financial results of operation will improve with the passage of time. No detailed analysis of costs and expenses for future years similar to that provided for the first year of operation under the treaty is presently available, but the conclusion to be drawn from the data so far available is that costs will rise at a rate higher than any foreseeable increase in revenues over the period of operation of the canal by the United States under the treaty.

If financial viability of the canal is equated to operation as a self-sustaining enterprise, the venture appears to be doomed from the first year after the treaty goes into effect. This was the thrust of the testimony of all the witnesses who urged or suggested the necessity for absorption of elements of the cost of operation by the Treasury through elimination of interest and depreciation or abandonment of the concept of recovery of the investment of the Government in the canal. There may be reasons to support adoption of such expedients, but the policy of operating the canal on a self-sustaining basis is not one of them.

2. Sources of funds to cover expenses of operation:

The ability of the canal to generate additional revenues required to cover canal operating expenses under the treaty lies in (1) possible increases in traffic, and (2) increases in rates of tolls.

a. Traffic increases. The factor cited most frequently as a partial solution to the financial problems of the Panama Canal under the treaty, is the anticipated increase in canal revenues from shipment through the canal of North Slope crude oil enroute from Alaska to the East Coast of the United States. The increase in Panama Canal revenue from this source has been estimated as high as $30 million a year, but for 1978 the estimate by the Panama Canal Company is $4 million. On the basis of the latter estimate, the deficiency of revenue in relation to costs would be reduced to $95 million or $103 million depending on whether the additional costs to the Treasury, noted above, are considered.

There is general agreement that the increase in revenues resulting from the movement of North Slope oil through the canal will be temporary because of the probability of use of less expensive alternatives such as pipelines. In the near time, the movement of this commodity through the canal will unquestionably improve the financial results of operation of the canal for two or three years, but it will neither eliminate the revenue deficiency in those years nor affect the long-term outlook.

The only other suggestion that canal revenues may increase to offset costs increases, even in part, is based on a presumption that historical growth of the canal will continue at the same rate or at a modified rate in the future. This logic has been rejected by most economists who insist that analysis of future individual commodity movements on established trade routes is the only sound basis for projections of future canal traffic.

b. Tolls increases. As previously indicated, on the basis of the Panama Canal revenue figure projected in the 1978 budget, the increased operating costs resulting from the treaty would require a toll increase of from 56% to 60% to put the canal on a self-sustaining basis.

Assuming an increase in revenue of $4 million from the movement through the canal of North Slope oil in the first year of operation under the treaty, the tolls increase would be reduced to the range of 52% to 57%.

Representatives of the shipping industry have indicated that increases in rates of tolls in the amount necessary to make the Panama Canal completely self-sustaining under the treaty are unrealistic and will price the canal out of the market because of the availability of less expensive alternatives.

Apparently, during the negotiation of the treaty there was no attempt at a systematic analysis of the potential canal revenues available for funding the cost of the various provisions eventually agreed to. The draft environmental impact statement, published by the Department of State in August 1977 (42 F.R. 43466) suggested that the assessment of the economic impact of the treaty was then impossible because of lack of data as to the costs of operation of the Panama Canal after the treaty became effective. The final EIS dated December 1977, states that "An initial toll increase in the neighborhood of 30 percent will be necessary to cover the operating costs . . . of the Canal during the new Treaty period. The exact level of toll increases will depend on such factors as:

The structure of the canal operation under the new Treaty, especially its operating cost requirements, and c. Appropriations or absorption of costs by U.S. If tolls revenues cannot be increased in an amount sufficient to make the canal self-supporting, it appears to be obvious that the deficiency in revenues will have to be made up from the U.S. Treasury, either through absorption of part of the costs or by direct appropriations. While the proponents of the treaty have consistently adhered to the position that one of the objectives of the treaty is that the canal continue to be be self-supporting, they have also simultaneously proposed that substantial costs of operation of the canal be absorbed by the U.S. Treasury through discontinuance of payment of interest on the investment of the United States in the canal, writing off the investment entirely, and treatment of various costs arising from the treaty as obligations of the Treasury rather than of the Panama Canal. Representatives of the shipping industry and others go further and also propose elimination of depreciation as a cost of operation recoverable from tolls, and payment of interest by the United States on Government funds derived from operation of the canal and deposited in the Treasury.

Interest on U.S. investment. At the Panama Canal Subcommittee hearings on November 30, 1977, the testimony of Administration witnesses indicated general unfamiliarity with the history and purpose of payment from canal revenues of interest on the investment of the United States Government in the canal. Interest was described by those witnesses as "profit" and it was suggested that elimination of the interest payment is necessary to keep the Panama Canal Commission "self-sustaining." The Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Treasury described the background of the requirement of interest payments as follows:

"One reason that payment was required in 1951 when the Canal Company was established as a self-sustaining business enterprise was to avoid allowing the users to have a subsidized toll or exclusively subsidized toll by requiring that the cost of capital be included in the toll base. That requirement will no longer be necessary because under the new arrangements, the toll will increase in order to meet the costs and requirements under the new treaty arrangements.

"Tolls will approach a more economic level and a need for interest payment as a device in effect to avoid subsidy will no longer be necessary."

The requirement that the Panama Canal Company pay interest to the Treasury on the net direct investment of the U.S. Government in the Company is found in section 62 of title 2 of the Canal Zone Code. (76A Stat. 8). This provision was originally enacted in 1948 in the legislation incorporating the Panama Railroad Company (62 Stat. 1076) pursuant to the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 841 et seq.), and of course applied to that corporation which had been operated as an adjunct of the Panama Canal since the time of construction of the canal. See State ex rel Rogers. v. Graves, 299 U.S. 401 (1937).

In 1950, when responsibility for the operation of the Panama Canal was transferred to the Panama Railroad Company, which was renamed the Panama Canal Company, the requirement for payment of interest on the Government's investment in the corporation was continued. (Act, Sept. 26, 1950 (64 Stat. 1041)). The 1950 legislation was based on recommendations of the then Bureau of the Budget, approved and forwarded to the Congress by President Truman. In reference to the requirement that the corporation pay interest to the Treasury, the report of the Bureau of the Budget stated:

"The principle that Federal business enterprises should pay a rate of return on the Government's investment equal to the cost of the money to the Treasury is now well settled. The President recommended in his 1948 budget message that corporations should be required to reimburse the Treasury for the full cost of money advanced to the corporation. There is no reason why the Panama Canal and its adjuncts should be exempted from payment of interest since they are essentially Federal business enterprises." H. Doc. 460, 81st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 8.

At the Panama Canal Subcommittee hearing on December 1, 1977, Leonard Kujawa, a partner in Arthur Andersen & Co., testifying as an expert on Panama Canal finances, confirmed that interest, as the cost of capital invested in a business, is part of the cost of operation of that business. As such, if a business operation such as the Panama Canal is to be self-sustaining, the revenues derived from the operation must be sufficient to cover interest payments on invested capital.

Conversely, as pointed out in the testimony of Comptroller General Staats, if annual interest payments are not made into the Treasury, the cast position of the Panama Canal Commission would be improved "but it would also reduce Treasury receipts and impact on the overall U.S. budget."

The amount of the interest payment to the Treasury in fiscal year 1978, shown in the 1978 budget program, is $19.7 million.

Depreciation. The statutory formula for establishing rates of tolls for use of the canal now includes depreciation as one of the elements of costs to be recovered from tolls.

The discontinuance of depreciation on part of the assets of the canal was another expedient suggested at the hearings for reducing the upward pressure on rates of tolls brought about by the treaty. On the other hand, the Comptroller General pointed out that the property transfers provided by the treaty would necessitate increased depreciation to make possible recovery of the U.S. investment in the canal over the life of the treaty and that "For the proposed Commission to be financially self-sufficient, toll rates would have to be raised to cover these increases in depreciation costs." The Comptroller General also noted that these actions "may not be economically sound, because of the impact on toll rates and possible adverse effect on traffic and revenues." In other words, under the treaty it may no longer be possible for the Panama Canal to be self-sustaining.

The property of the United States in the Canal Zone, to be transferred to Panama under the terms of the treaty, was acquired at an original cost of about $1 billion. The book value of property associated with the Panama Canal, exclusive of military property, is currently $752 million.

Other treaty costs. Costs to the U.S. Treasury resulting from the treaty that are not directly and immediately associated with operation of the canal probably could not be included in the tolls formula for payment out of revenues of the canal. These costs have not been completely identified but they appear to include appropriations required to fund part of the economic assistance program under the separate agreement accompanying the treaty, the cost of the joint study for the need for and feasibility of a sea level canal for which the treaty provides, the loss to the Treasury of the payment now being made in reimbursement of capital appropriations to the Canal Zone Government, and possibly the cost to the Civil Service Commission and military departments of employee assistance programs contemplated by the treaty.

3. Form of Government agency to be established to operate the Panama Canal:

Legislation to be enacted by the Congress must establish the Government agency to operate the canal and provide the ground rules for its operation.

Article III of the Panama Canal treaty provides that the United States will carry out its responsibilities by means of a U.S. Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission "which shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America." The treaty also provides that the Panama Canal Commission "shall be supervised" by a Board composed of nine members, five of whom are to be U.S. nationals and four nationals of Panama.

From the time of completion of the canal in 1914 until 1951, the canal was operated by an independent agency called The Panama Canal. The Panama Canal was established and functioned in accordance with the laws of the United States generally applicable to all Government agencies, including the various laws governing the financial management of such agencies now largely incorporated in title 31 of the U.S. Code. Under those laws revenues derived from operation of the canal were paid into the Treasury, and costs of operations weres paid from direct appropriations for that purpose.

In 1950, Congress transferred responsibility for operation of the canal to the Panama Railroad Company, a government agency in corporate form that had been used by the United States Government as an adjunct to the operation of the canal from the time of construction of the canal. The corporation was renamed the Panama Canal Company and its operations were subject to the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act as well as other applicable provisions of title 31 of the U.S. Code. Revenues from the operation of the canal and related activities are deposited in the Treasury or depository banks approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and expenditures are authorized by the Congress in appropriation acts authorizing the use of such revenues for the purposes set out in the corporation's budget program, as modified by the Congress in the appropriation act.

The 1950 legislation transferring operation of the canal to the Panama Canal Company changed the name of the agency known as The Panama Canal to Canal Zone Government with the responsibility of providing the various services incident to the civil government of the Canal Zone. No basic change was made in the form of organization of that agency. A brief summary of the history and laws applicable to the operation of the two agencies now responsible for operation of the canal and the government of the Canal Zone is included in the separate study of the relationship of the treaty provisions to the Constitutional power of Congress to make appropriations.

In establishing the government agency for operation of the canal under the new treaty, the Congress could select either the corporate form along the lines of the Panama Canal Company, the non-corporate form, following the prototype of the original Panama Canal agency, or some combination of the two. Some of the advantageous features of the corporate form, such as business-type budgeting and audit by the General Accounting Office, have been referred to by the Comptroller General. On the other hand, the corporate form is particularly useful for business operations that are truly self-sustaining, and if a substantial amount of direct or indirect subsidy is involved, the conventional unincorporated government agency offers the advantages of closer control by the Congress. Of course, if the unincorporated form of agency is selected, the legislation could incorporate provision for business-type budgets and audit by the General Accounting Office.

A related matter of concern is that of providing for the qualifications and method of appointment of members of the Board to be appointed to supervise the Panama Canal Commission. This feature of the legislation will be especially important in view of the provisions of the treaty for division of the membership between nationals of the United States and Panama.

4. Ambiguity of treaty provisions:

a. General considerations. Ambiguities in the language of the two treaties pose serious problems of interpretation that are virtually certain to become the subject of future controversy. Although the U.S. treaty negotiators have offered their explanations of the ambiguous language, those interpretations have often been at direct variance with those published by the Panamanian negotiators. In considering the significance of these diverse interpretations, the United States Government should keep in mind the enumeration of the causes of conflict between the United States and Panama, published by the Government of Panama on the occasion of the rejection by Panama of the new treaties negotiated in 1967. The concluding paragraph of Part I of the document read as follows:

"7. Last, so as not to make the list of causes of conflict interminable, we mention the greatest cause, the constant cause, the cause that has daily contributed to keep alive the resentment of Panamanians and feeds a sentiment of rebellion against the offensive presence in part of the national territory of a foreign Government which acts in an arbitrary, totalitarian and absolute manner, contemptuous toward the presence of the territorial sovereign. We refer to the invariable conduct of the Government of the United States of America of interpreting the clauses of the existing treaties in the manner most convenient to their interests and contrary to Panama's rights and imposing their arbitrary and unfair interpretations with the power in their hands, and that Panama has not been able to counteract to date, of excluding and throwing out of the Canal Zone the official presence of Panama and the enforcement of our laws." Reprinted in Report on the Problems Concerning the Panama Canal, Committee on Merchant Marine & Fisheries, 91st Cong., 2d Sess., p. 87.

As the quoted statement implies, the diplomatic relations of the United States and Panama have been characterized by almost continuous controversy over the construction of the language of treaties and agreements that the United States usually has regarded as plain and unambiguous. To cite only one example, Article V of the 1942 Agreement for the Lease of Defense Sites in the Republic of Panama (57 Stat. 1232) provided that the defense sites would be vacated "within one year after the date on which the definitive treaty of peace which brings about the cessation of the present war, shall have entered into effect." In 1947, Panama asserted that the surrender of Japan constituted a "definitive treaty of peace" ending the war. The United States did not accept that interpretation, but eventually yielded to pressure and vacated the sites before the peace treaty was signed. The history of this particular disagreement is set out at length in the Department of State's publication Foreign Relations of the United States for the years 1946 (pp. 1095, et seq.) and 1947 (pp. 881, et seq.).

b. Payments to Panama. Paragraph 4(a) of Article XIII of the treaty provides for payment to Panama of an annual amount of 30 cents "per Panama Canal net ton, or its equivalent, for each vessel transiting the Canal for which tolls are charged." (Emphasis supplied.) A Panama Canal net ton is clearly defined in existing laws and regulations as the basis for establishing rates of tolls for use of the canal. However, not all vessels are susceptible of measurement in Panama Canal net tons; some ships and other craft, such as warships, floating drydocks, etc., pay tolls on a displacement basis. Whether or not the prhase "or its equivalent" relates to the payment to Panama for ships that pay tolls on displacement rather than "Panama Canal" tonnage is not clear from the treaty provisions. If that is the intent of the provision, there is no criterion provided for determining what is the equivalent of a Panama Canal net ton in computing the payment to Panama. This could obviously become a matter of controversy and should be clarified before the treaty is ratified.

Paragraph 4(c) of Article XIII provides for a payment to Panama, in addition to other payments, of $10 million per year "to be paid out of canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission including amounts paid pursuant to the treaty."

This provision apparently contemplates determination of whether or not the payment is due on a cash basis. If so, and if "expenditures" are limited to payments actually made, excluding unpaid obligations, it could create a serious problem for the financial administration of the canal. The theory of the treaty provisions seems to have derived from the statutory provision that now requires the Panama Canal Company to pay into the Treasury annually the amount of funds in excess of the Company's requirements for working capital and for authorized plant replacement and expansion. (2 C.Z. Code 70). However, there are obvious differences between the language of the two provisions, and it is questionable whether the treaty provision would permit retention by the Panama Canal Commission of funds for working capital or plant replacement and expansion.

The precise meaning of this paragraph of the treaty would become a matter of considerable importance to the financial management of the canal under the new treaty, and its meaning should be clarified before legislation is enacted to carry it into effect.

A third ambiguity appears in paragraph 5 of Article III of the treaty which, after providing for payment to Panama of $10 million in reimbursement for certain services, goes on to provide that at three year intervals "the costs involved in furnishing said services shall be reexamined to determine whether an adjustment of the annual payment should be made because of inflation and other relevant factors affecting the cost of such services." (Emphasis supplied.) There is nothing in the treaty or other documents accompanying the treaty that defines what other relevant factors are for consideration in the adjustment of the amount of this payment. It was suggested at the hearing that the actual cost of services provided might be one such factor, but it would appear to be desirable to reach a firm understanding, with appropriate documentation, defining the meaning of the phrase in question.

Implicit in all the provisions for payments to Panama is an ambiguity arising from the absence of any language referring to the indebtedness of the Government of Panama to the Panama Canal Company and Canal Zone Government, now aggregating some $8.5 million. In normal business transactions provision would be made either for set-off of this amount against the payments to Panama or for outright cancellation of the debt. Whichever result is intended, it should be clearly understood by both parties and incorporated in the legislation to carry the treaty into effect.

c. Property transfers. Paragraph 1 of Article XIII of the treaty provides that on termination of the treaty, Panama will assume total responsibility for operation of the Panama Canal which shall be turned over in operating condition and "free of liens and debts, except as the two parties may otherwise agree."

At the end of any year of operation of the canal as a continuing business enterprise, there remain and are carried forward obligations incurred in completed periods of operation, such as unpaid employee compensation, liability for unused leave, and other accounts payable, which aggregated $80 million in 1976, and are estimated at $87 million in 1978.

Whether or not the quoted provision of Article XIII requires the liquidation of these liabilities before the canal is turned over to Panama is not clear, but the ambiguity should be resolved to permit orderly financial planning and management in the period intervening between the effective date and termination of the treaty.

d. Use of the canal by U.S. Government vessels. Paragraph I of Article VI of the neutrality treaty provides that vessels of war and auxiliary vessels of the United States and of Panama "will be entitled to transit the Canal expeditiously." At the hearings on the treaties this provision has been referred to as providing that warships of the United States are entitled to priority in transit in case of emergency, but other statements in Panama by the treaty negotiators have indicated that no priority of passage is involved.

The statement issued by the White House after the meeting between President Carter and General Torrijos on October 14, 1977, discussed below, confirms that the provision in question "is intended, and shall be interpreted to assure the transit of such vessels through the canal as quickly as possible, without any impediment, with expedited treatment, and in case of need or emergency, to go to the head of the line of vessels in order to transit the canal rapidly."

e. Defense of the canal. Article IV of the Panama Canal treaty provides that "Each party shall act, in accordance with its constitutional processes, to meet the danger resulting from an armed attack, or other action which threatens the security of the Panama Canal or of ships transiting it." Article V provides specifically against intervention in the internal affairs of Panama by U.S. nationals employed by the Commission. Article II of the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal provides that Panama declares the "neutrality" of the canal in order that it shall remain open to peaceful transit of vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality, and Article IV provides that the United States and Panama agree to maintain the "regime of neutrality" established by the treaty "in order that the canal shall remain permanently neutral."

In the light of all these provisions the question has been raised as to whether the United States would be authorized to take appropriate action to keep the canal open if the threat to the operation of the canal originates in Panama. The statement issued by the White House after the meeting between President Carter and General Torrijos on October 14, 1977, states that under the neutrality treaty Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal shall be open and secure to ships of all nations and that each country "shall, in accordance with its constitutional processes, defend the canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the canal." The statement goes on to say, however, that this does not mean nor shall it be interpreted as a right of intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any U.S. action will be directed at insuring that the canal "will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or politcal independence of Panama." Administration witnesses at the subcommittee hearing expressed the view that the treaty gives the United States the right to take whatever steps the United States deems necessary to maintain the neutrality of the canal, no matter what the threat may be.

f. Joint statement of October 1977. The statements issued by President Carter on October 14, and General Torrijos on October 18, for the purpose of eliminating the ambiguities in the neutrality treaty are intrinsically ambiguous in themselves.

Apparently the statements were entirely informal. On his return to Panama following his meeting with President Carter, the press reported that General Torrijos emphasized that he had not signed anything on his visit to Washington. Granting that the statement represents the personal interpretation of the treaty provisions discussed on the part of President Carter and General Torrijos, the effect of the informal unsigned statements as amplifications of the language of the treaty is at least open to question.

5. Constitutional issues:

In addition to the financial problems in operation of the Panama Canal under the new treaties, the treaty language poses two fundamental constitutional problems that are of even greater significance to the United States Government, namely, the requirement for action by the Congress to dispose of property of the United States and to make appropriations of public funds. The treaty language purports to convey property of the United States to Panama and to provide for payments to Panama without action by the Congress as the Constitution requires. These issues are addressed at length in a memorandum on the necessity for appropriations to authorize the payments to Panama presented at the subcommittee hearings on December 1, 1977, and in extensive hearings and briefings conducted by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries in the first session of the 95th Congress. A further hearing by the Committee on the constitutional issues is scheduled in January, 1978.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am concerned about the constitutional aspect of these treaties, and I fought very hard last week to try to have the Constitution upheld. I think we should fight very hard to have it upheld this week, and that is the purpose of my amendment.

I think time will vindicate our position. On the other hand, vindication or not, we happen to be right on these issues.

I do not believe the Panamanian Government should be upset if this amendment happens to succeed because of our constitutional processes. They must be abided by, and I do not think this is a particularly difficult problem for them, and it might well avoid the future economic difficulties which could arise which could cause a shutdown of the canal if we are not perceptive and farsighted enough now to abide by the terms of the Constitution.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ALLEN addressed to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PELL). The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, when the first protests by certain elements in Panama to the provisions of the Neutrality Treaty, approved earlier by the Senate, came to light, I felt that possibly this was a ploy by the Panamanian dictator to assure that no further amendments or reservations would be attached to the Panama Canal Treaty. I thought the dictator was relying upon the exchange of letters between the President and the dictator on March 15, in which the dictator expressed concern about the reservations that he understood were in line for approval in the United States Senate. The President wrote him a letter giving him assurance that whatever was done there would be no departure from the spirit of the agreement into which the President and the dictator entered, which has been called the Memorandum of Agreement.

Since that time, however, the Ambassador, the permanent representative of Panama, to the United Nations General Assembly, Jorge E. Illueca—with whom, I might say, I debated this issue at the University of Alabama some months ago—has written to the Secretary General of the United Nations in which he sets out the Resolution of Ratification. He gives a statement made on the floor by Senator DENNIS DECONCINI and also a statement by Senator EDWARD KENNEDY, ending up with a communique from the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Panama issued on the 27th of March, 1978, in which the closing paragraph reads as follows:

> We recommend to our fellow citizens to study objectively the documents published today in Spanish and English, so that they might assist the government in taking the most patriotic decision which, as stated by General Omar Torrijos Herrera, Head of the Government of Panama, will be taken within the framework of a great national consensus.

So it is obvious, Mr. President, that the Panamanians are seeking to undercut the provisions of this treaty even before notes of ratification are exchanged between the heads of government as provided by law for the approval of treaties.

So, Mr. President, there does seem to be general concern and general opposition in Panama to the approval of these treaties, and the question I would like to pose is: Why should we approve a treaty that gives away the Panama Canal under the terms under which it is to be given away, both as to the defense of the canal and as to the protection of the American taxpayer, why should we give the canal away when the people of Panama are not satisfied with the terms of the treaty as agreed to here in the United States Senate?

We have been told, Mr. President, as one of the chief arguments for these treaties that they were necessary in order to avoid violence, in order to avoid riots, in order to avoid sabotage of the canal.

But, Mr. President, it looks like just the reverse of that is true. It looks like if we approve these treaties and send them to Panama for ratification, it is going to cause a great national upheaval in Panama. Far from being a good neighbor gesture it apparently is regarded as another effort at colonialism, as another effort of domination of Panama by the United States Government, and as another attack upon the sovereignty of Panama.

So why, Mr. President, should we force this treaty on the Panamanians?

I have prepared an amendment, that I will introduce at the proper time saying that this treaty shall not go into force—and, of course, until it goes into force the Neutrality Treaty cannot go into force, but this treaty, the Panama Canal Treaty, cannot go into force—until it has been approved in a national plebiscite held in Panama.

Mr. President, why should we send to Panama and have approved by the dictator, acting for the Government of Panama, it, of course, being a one-man government, why should we send that treaty down for approval when quite obviously it is opposed by, if not a majority of the people of Panama—and it looks like various business, professional and labor groups there are organizing behind the opposition to the treaty—but why should we enter into a compact with Panama that is not approved by the people of Panama?

So my amendment—and I hope the Members of the Senate will look with favor on this amendment, and I hope the leadership will agree to this amendment—why should we ask the Panamanian Government to agree to a treaty unless we are sure that the people of Panama want such treaty?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator, since he has mentioned the leadership, yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I will say quickly I do not favor the Senator's amendment. I respect his right to call it up. I certainly respect his right to speak in support of it, and I certainly respect his dedication to the cause of defeating the treaties and, of course, this would be one more amendment by which that rejection could ultimately be brought about.

So I would not want to support the Senator's amendment, I will just say that in advance. Moreover, I think I should state that we have been hearing all along in this debate that the Senate is just acting in the interests of the people of Panama, in the interest of the Government of Panama, acting at the behest of Mr. Torrijos and that the interests of the United States are being subordinated to the interests of the Panamanian Government.

Now, I think it is obvious that there is opposition to these treaties in Panama. There was when the plebiscite occurred down there. But there has been an attempt to obfuscate that opposition.

Of course, there is opposition to the treaties down there. There is opposition to them in this country. But I would urge Senators to keep their eye on the ball and keep a steady hand on the helm, and would urge people at both ends, not only in the United States but also in Panama, to keep cool heads. This is a time to remain cool, in my judgment.

Let us vote on the treaties on the basis of the merits of the treaties, on the basis of what is in the best interests of the United States. I have not seen any indication, at this point at least, that the Panamanian Government intends to refuse to exchange instruments of ratification if and when that time comes.

I think we should go right ahead and do what we think ought to be done in the interests of this country, of our country, and its good relations not only with Panama but with other Latin American countries.

Finally, as to the Senator's suggestion that the amendment which he intends to offer would require a new plebiscite in Panama, it seems to me that the Senate, if it were to adopt that amendment, would be attempting to amend the Constitution of the Republic of Panama. That Constitution requires a plebiscite on a treaty, but I do not know of any requirement of that Constitution that there be a second plebiscite dealing with the reservations, understandings, et cetera, that might be attached to a treaty. So the Senator's amendment, it would seem to me, would be looked upon by the people of Panama as a rather presumptuous incursion upon their constitutional rights.

I want to say finally—and I thank the Senator from Alabama for being so courteous and patient in yielding to me. He has the floor, and I will try to not to be overly long.

Finally, I think we have to recognize that the people of Panama have been patient and long suffering. For 75 years they have lived with a bone in their throats, as they have viewed the 1903 treaty. It has been a continuing source of frustration to them, and a continuing sore spot in our relations with Panama. I think they have been very patient. They have not attempted at any time to abrogate that treaty. They have lived up to their responsibilities and duties under it.

I must say that I think they have also been very patient and forbearing as they have listened to the debate in the Senate on the treaties. This debate goes out on the National Public Radio. It is translated into Spanish, and the Panamanian people have listened to every word of it. I commend them on the equanimity that they have shown as I know from time to time, without any such intention on the part of Senators, the Panamanian people, in my judgment, have probably thought that they were being insulted by some things that have been said, again I would hasten to say through inadvertence and probably misunderstanding on the part of the Panamanian people themselves in the interpretations they have placed on things that are said.

I wish to commend the Panamanian people on keeping their cool and maintaining their equanimity in this situation, in the light of some of the things that they may have interpreted as demeaning on the part of those of us who have spoken here in the Senate. I commend and compliment them.

I thank the Senator from Alabama for his extraordinary courtesy in yielding to me to take the floor at this time, and being so kind as not to interrupt my statement. I have finished, and I express my gratitude to him.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader for his very fine remarks. I am always glad to yield to the majority leader when he has questions to ask, when he has arguments to make, or when he has information that he thinks would be helpful to the Senate.

Now I would hope that I would be permitted to conclude my remarks, inasmuch as the position of the leadership has been so fully stated. I might say, though, Mr. President, that it comes as no surprise to me that the distinguished majority leader should take the position that he is opposed to this amendment, because he has not been for a single amendment that has been offered during the 2 months that these treaties have been before the U.S. Senate, other than two so-called leadership amendments. So it did not come as much of a surprise to the Senator from Alabama. I did express the hope that the leadership would agree to this amendment, but it did not surprise me when my hope was not fulfilled by a statement from the leadership that it would support this amendment.

The distinguished Senator said, as to our putting into the treaty a provision that before the treaty goes into effect it should be approved by national plebiscite in Panama, that whereas there is a provision, he states, in the Panamanian Constitution, requiring a plebiscite for the approval of a treaty, he knows of no provision for a second plebiscite.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that apparently the Panamanians feel that this is a different document from the document that was approved in the plebiscite, thus getting back to a familiar argument of mine that Mr. Torrijos jumped the gun in calling for this plebiscite, because he knew the Senate of the United States has the constitutional right and duty of advising the President with respect to this treaty, and that that advice is in the form of amendments to the treaty, shaping the treaty to the views of the Senate in the advice that it gives to the President.

But, Mr. President, it is apparent even from the words of the dictator that there are tremendous grounds for opposition to this treaty in Panama. So why, Mr. President, should we give away a valuable asset of this country, valuable from the standpoint of our economic well-being and valuable from the standpoint of our military security? Why should we force this treaty on Panama when it is so obvious that a large portion of the people there—it was one-third in the plebiscite, and obviously the opposition is growing.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator to say he was not going to interrupt me any more.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I did not say that, but I really did not mean to interrupt.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; I will yield to the distinguished Senator, then, if he wishes to comment on what I have said. I hate to have my remarks broken up with opposition to each statement that I make, but I will be glad to yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may I say to the distinguished Senator from Alabama that I did not intend to interrupt him again, but this rhetorical question is very intriguing.

Mr. ALLEN. A rhetorical question is not supposed to be answered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Well, in this instance I want to respond. The Senator asks, "Why should we force this treaty on the Panamanian people?"

We are not forcing it on them.

Mr. ALLEN. How are they going to state their opposition, if the dictator does not call another plebiscite?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. They do not have to enter into the exchange of the instruments of ratification. We are not forcing them.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not understand how the Senator says we do not force the treaty on Panama.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Because the other party to this treaty, as with any other treaty, may decline to enter into the exchange of the instruments of ratification.

Mr. ALLEN. They will not have any opportunity of expressing themselves unless we write it into the treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator was arguing a minute ago that there was a lot of opposition to these treaties.

Mr. ALLEN. There is not opposition by Mr. Torrijos. He is willing to accept them. But he fears the Panamanian people. He will not submit it to them.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator is attempting to read the mind or second-guess what someone else might do. But the Panamanian Government is under no obligation to enter into the exchange of the instruments of ratification, if it does not want to. It can exercise the same right that any other party can.

Mr. ALLEN. But Torrijos will keep them from doing it. He will not submit the question to a plebiscite.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator. We all know, of course, that another chief argument made by the proponents of this treaty is the argument that the treaty is needed to eliminate the danger of sabotage, riots, and violence.

The argument has been made here on the floor that any amendments to the treaty would kill the treaty. Apparently, they are fearful that if a new plebiscite was called in Panama, the Panamanian people would reject it. But if one of the purposes of the treaty was to do a good neighborly act in giving the canal to Panama, paying them, in effect, to take it—we owe $319 million on it now which is to be wiped out under the treaties, and there are other items of expense—if this treaty is going to cause riots in Panama, possible sabotage, does it not indicate that even if the treaty is agreed to, if dictator Torrijos approves it, that that is just going to start the riots, that is just going to start the danger of sabotage, that is just going to start demands for more and more, demands to turn the canal over to Panama prior to the year 2000?

Already they are trying to undercut the provisions of the treaty in the U.N. I do not know what the U.N. has to do with it, but apparently Panama thinks it has something to do with it. I thought this was a treaty between Panama and the United States.

I know on the Neutrality Treaty other nations of the world have a right to endorse the neutrality aspect of it. But by and large and exclusively, for that matter, it is a treaty between the United States and Panama. Why should they be notifying the U.N. of their disapproval of the DeConcini amendment? There is already talk, as announced on national TV, that the leadership or the proponents—the proponents of the treaty, as I do not know about the leadership—the proponents are trying to get up an amendment that will water or soften down the proposals of the DeConcini amendment.

I believe they would be treading on dangerous grounds if they seek to water down the DeConcini amendment in the second treaty. We all know that the DeConcini amendment was the vehicle by which at least two votes here in the Senate were gained for the treaty. Would it be keeping faith with the Senators who voted for the treaty in return for the administration's agreement to the DeConcini amendment, would it be keeping faith with the Senate and with those Senators who voted for the treaty because the DeConcini amendment was agreed to, if we water down the DeConcini amendment in this treaty and say that the DeConcini amendment does mean what it says, that is, the right of the United States to intervene at any time after the year 2000 to keep the canal open?

We were told that the leadership amendment was going to do that, but apparently it is not. The leadership amendment was supposed to give us the unilateral right to intervene in Panama, so why should the DeConcini amendment cause so much trouble in Panama, trouble to the point where it is stated that efforts will be made by the proponents of the treaties to water down the DeConcini amendment?

Mr. President, it is quite obvious to me that if these are to be treaties between the U.S. Government and the people of Panama, that the people of Panama should have a right to express their opinion on the treaties, as modified here in the U.S. Senate.

I think this is the best way to guarantee that we will know if the people of Panama approve of this treaty, by letting them say so. Just having an agreement with Dictator Torrijos is not enough. He has never been elected by the people. Even if he was, that would not give him a right to act for the people of Panama in the face of this strong opposition that is manifesting itself in Panama.

Also, Mr. President, I do not approve of the attitude of the Panamanians. I think it ill becomes the Panamanians to have the Panama Canal given to them, giving them money to take the canal, and merely because the U.S. Senate says we should have the right to intervene in Panama to protect and defend the canal for them to say, "Well, we do not want it on that basis. We want it on some other basis," and for us not to have the right to protect the canal is something that I feel is not well taken, to insist that we merely rubber-stamp these treaties.

Mr. President, the leadership has sought to defeat all amendments to the treaties, and they apparently thought it would not be too bad to let in some reservations.

I am rather of the opinion, Mr. President, that managers of the treaty and the leadership thought that reservations would not have too much force, that they would be innocuous, and they let in the DeConcini amendment as an amendment establishing a reservation to the resolution of ratification, even though they had turned down the language of the DeConcini amendment when it was offered as an amendment to the treaty. Apparently, they misjudged the effect of a reservation, because the DeConcini amendment, so-called, is not an amendment to the resolution of ratification. But they let in a tiger when they allowed the DeConcini amendment to the resolution of ratification to be agreed to with leadership support.

Just the other evening, I heard the distinguished majority leader tell the distinguished Senator from Louisiana that he would support a reservation to this treaty giving us the right, which we do not have in the treaty, to negotiate with any other nation as we see fit for the purpose of building a canal in such a nation. So, apparently, that is going to be a reservation that will be added.

I feel reasonably sure that a reservation will be added saying that the Panama Canal, after we do sign these treaties, will not cause any expense to the American taxpayer. I rather believe that, while that will not be accepted as an amendment to the treaty, it will be passed as a reservation to the treaty.

So, Mr. President, whereas I thought originally that Dictator Torrijos was using these disturbances in Panama to assure that we did not add any further amendments to this treaty, I believe now that he is in serious trouble in being able to get the backing of public opinion for this treaty in Panama. I feel that it is only right that we ascertain the Panamanian will by calling for a plebiscite in Panama before this treaty goes into effect. Mr. President, it would be unwise for us to ram this treaty down the throats of the people of Panama with there being substantial reason for believing that the people of Panama do not approve of this. If they do not approve of it, they are going to show that disapproval in the years to come.

The managers of the bill have sought to kill and have killed all of the amendments offered to this treaty. They say that it would kill the treaty. That being true, Mr. President, it seems to me that the managers of the bill have cast their lot with Dictator Torrijos and his wishes—that is, no amendments to the treaty. It seems to me, and I resent it on the part of the managers of the bill and the leadership and the administration, that these protests are being made in Panama to such an extent that Panama is trying to undo the work of the United States Senate on this treaty providing for the evacuation of all of our troops by the year 2000 and allowing Panama to go it alone. It seems to me that it ill becomes the Panamanians, to burn the President in effigy in Panama, a man who has staked his political future and the success of this administration on the approval of the Panama Canal treaties. These treaties provide for giving the canal to Panama, reserving some rights of defense.

Why should they object to defending the canal? It takes the burden off Panama. For this great gift to be made to the Panamanian people, the leadership on both sides of the aisle having stuck their necks out to accommodate the Panamanian people, to beat down all amendments to these treaties, and then riot down there to show their disapproval of the treaties, burn the President in effigy, hardly seems to be something that would leave a good taste in the collective mouths of the Members of the U.S. Senate.

I understand Mr. DECONCINI is going to offer the same amendment and, failing in that, a reservation to this treaty, providing for the same right of the United States to keep the canal open. I am hopeful that he will. Certainly, I shall support it, as I supported his other reservation.

These treaties fall far short of their supposed goal of eliminating riots, eliminating violence, eliminating the possibility of sabotage. Did they do it? I submit, Mr. President, that they do not, that the situation is an anomalous situation: to promote riots, approve the treaties; to stop riots, kill the treaties. So it looks like the situation has completely reversed itself. If we want to end the riots, let us kill the treaties.

I might say, Mr. President, that the defeat of the treaties does not mean that negotiations have ended. Negotiations can start again the very next day, just as they are negotiating now, Mr. President, to try to find out how they can blunt or water down the DeConcini amendment, which has been approved by the Senate and which was accepted in order to gain votes for the treaty in the Senate. What sort of action would it be, after having agreed to the DeConcini amendment and obtained its passage and obtained the passage of the neutrality treaty itself, how could we then back up and water it down with a provision in this treaty saying it does not mean anything? I suggest that if the proponents of the treaties come forward with any such amendment, these two or three doubtful Senators—and there are such—I dare say they are not going to see the DeConcini amendment weakened when its approval was what got them to vote for the first treaty itself. So that would be a hazardous course to pursue.

Mr. President, with the Panamanians up in arms about this treaty, why should we force it upon them? This treaty needs more negotiating. With the situation on the parliamentary status of the treaty, we must vote on the 18th unless, by unanimous consent, the treaty is sent back to the Committee on Foreign Relations for further study.

They might come up with some perfecting amendments. They had the treaty before the Foreign Relations Committee for several weeks, or several months, I believe. They did not come up with any committee amendments, however.

I believe they might study the treaties a little bit more and come out with some constructive amendments, some amendments that would cure this impasse that exists now between the American people and the Panamanian people.

I think it is passing strange, Mr. President, that with the people of the United States, as I see it, strongly opposed to these treaties and, apparently, a large percentage of Panamanians opposed to the treaties, why should the U.S. Senate ram it down the throats of the people of Panama and the people of the United States, as well?

I do not believe it makes too much sense. I hope that some Senators who voted for the treaty before, thinking that it met with the approval of the people of Panama as a result of a 2-to-1 vote in favor of the treaties prior to action by the Senate, thinking that the people of Panama approved it by a 2-to-1 vote, will now see that the various elements in Panama that make up the power structure there and the people themselves are rioting against the approval of the treaty.

So should we defy the public opinion of our country and what seems to be the public opinion of Panama by approving this treaty and sending it down to Panama and saying, "Take it or leave it"?

I do not believe we are acting in any good neighborly fashion. I do not believe we are acting, as I see it, responsibly or responsively to the will of the American people.

So this great U.S. Senate, having this treaty in our hand, a treaty that we thought Panama wanted, now finds in all probability that the people of Panama do not want it. I feel that we would be going counter to the public opinion in both countries if we should insist on passing or agreeing to this treaty.

Mr. President, the leadership and the managers of the treaty have adopted the position of no amendments for fear of upsetting the Panamanians. Having adopted that policy, and been highly successful in preventing amendments, why should the Panamanians indicate such displeasure with what has been done in the U.S. Senate at the behest of the administration?

The administration has accepted every single change that has been made in these treaties. Not a one has gone contrary to the wishes of the leadership, the managers of the bill, and the administration. Not a single one.

They have managed the strategy of the treaties. They have used reservations to gain votes—the administration did, acquiesced in by the leadership on the DeConcini amendment.

So who do we have to blame for this impasse that we have come to? It is not the ones here in the Senate who have tried to strengthen these treaties to provide for greater defense rights for the American people, to provide for protection of the American taxpayer. We are not the ones who have brought this sorry state of affairs to culmination, a culmination in riots in Panama in opposition to the treaties, when we were assured that the agreement to the treaties was necessary to stop riots. That certainly is an anomalous situation.

It does look, Mr. President, as if in order to stop the riots, stop the danger of sabotage, let us defeat this treaty, which will have the result of defeating the other treaty, as well, and then go back to the negotiating table.

I see the distinguished Senator from Maryland wishes to speak, so I will yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Kansas is to be recognized under a unanimous-consent order, by 1 o'clock to offer an amendment and to speak thereon.

Mr. President, in his great tragedy "Othello," Shakespeare sets out and develops fully one of the more interesting characters in literature—Iago. Iago, of course, would show great solicitude for Cassio, his ambitions to become a captain, and urge Cassio to have Desdemona plead his cause. Then Iago would pass around the other side of the palace and talk to Othello and raise in Othello's mind certain doubts about Desdemona. Back and forth Iago would play this game.

Of course, the result of the game was to enrage Othello, to enrage him, to goad him on, to lead him down a path where Othello in the end committed acts that not only caused him to be seized with remorse, but led him to take his own life.

What Iago did, and very successfully in that play, was to lead Othello to smother his loyal wife and then, as a consequence of that, to stab himself to death.

He was driven to it. He was driven to it by Iago, who so skillfully played first to one emotion and then to another, and he was led to self-destruction.

Now, words, Mr. President, can have a tremendous impact. Words, after all, are one of the hallmarks of civilized people. But words can also be used, Mr. President, to arouse emotions, to create misunderstandings, to heighten antagonism, to fan anger and passion, to create divisions, to generate hostility. Through history, words, Mr. President, have frequently been used in public issues as they were used by Iago in private matters, to cause people, in effect, to destroy themselves. The treaties before us are not a play. The treaties before us are extremely serious business for this Nation and for Panama and, indeed, are extremely serious business for the peace of the world and for questions as to how the world will develop in the remainder of this century and into the next century. The treaties involve very fundamental questions of our national purposes and our national objectives.

The debate on the treaties has, of course, taken many turns. It should be noted that the debate is being carried in Panama, simultaneously translated into Spanish, so that the words uttered in the Senate of the United States are carried immediately in Spanish in the Republic of Panama. This debate also is being carried on public radio in this country; and as others have observed earlier on the floor, it is being carried very well and skillfully indeed. The debate also is carried in Panama. So the words that are spoken register in both places at the same time.

Those words can appeal to reason or they can appeal to emotion. Words can also appear to show solicitude for the sensitivities of others at the same time they are really exciting emotions of resentment and anger as to what is perceived to be the attitude of one people toward another.

One hopes that the lessons of Shakespeare's great play "Othello" remain in people's minds. One hopes that the impact which words can have is fully appreciated. One hopes that there will be no driving of a people toward a public end comparable to the end of this play, where, as a consequence of Iago's poisonous words and actions, Othello killed his wife and then killed himself.

Mr. President, we have a Panama Canal Treaty before us, and the Senate, as the majority leader has said, has its work to do. It is serious work. It is important work. It involves important questions of our country's national interests, and it needs to be considered with an attitude of reason.

We have our judgments to make here. The Republic of Panama is a sovereign and independent country, and has its judgments to make. They do not make our judgments, and we do not make theirs. We try to work together in such a way that an agreement that protects the interests of both countries can be reached, and there are many who are trying to achieve that. There are many who feel that an agreement between our two countries that fully protects the interests of both countries is achievable. In fact, the proponents of these treaties feel that the treaties have achieved such an agreement.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. I yield to the Senator, briefly.

Mr. GRAVEL. I should like to explore something that essentially the Senator from Maryland is doing and saying, and that is the new phenomenon of a Senate debate taking place——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). Under the previous order, the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) is to be recognized at 1 o'clock. The Chair has accorded the distinguished Senator from Maryland 5 additional minutes at this time.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the debate be allowed to continue until Mr. DOLE arrives in the Chamber, and we will immediately then bring it to a close.

Mr. GRAVEL. Without the time being charged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator include the request that it not extend beyond 1:15?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes; not to extend beyond 10 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GRAVEL. My colleague made reference to the fact that these broadcasts are being beamed to Panama and have simultaneous translation. I think we can easily recognize that not all that many Americans are listening to public radio. I believe a number of concerned Americans are. But I think we can justifiably say that most Americans are not all that knowledgeable about the workings of the Senate. In fact, I have had an American occasionally ask me, "How many Senators are from a State?" or, "How many Senators do you have from Alaska?" So it comes down to some pretty fundamental ignorance.

Therefore, I do not think it would be unreasonable to assume that the average person in Panama may not understand all the niceties that exist in this body.

So, when we have a debate such as we have had during the last month, in which we see, day after day, one side taking what it thinks is tactical advantage by repeatedly calling the head of state a dictator, with the vilest connotations, the average Panamanian down there, who knows that Mr. Torrijos has doubled the amount of schools that were in existence and knows that he just completed a road to his farm cooperatives, that he helped set up the cooperatives, does not take too kindly to that.

How does a Panamanian, listening to a lot of the inferences as to their inferiority as human beings, or their capacities, or their motivations with respect to justice and how they would operate the canal—how does a Panamanian citizen who has been listening to the radio and hearing this diatribe react emotionally? I think it will mean very little to him what happens to the treaties, whether they are approved or not. He is going to feel resentment, just as if an Alaskan were to listen, day in and day out, to some official from France or Russia insult him.

So we go ahead and do our work, but the residue that is in the minds of the people will be most damaging.

What I suggest to my colleague from Maryland is that we have an unusual rule in this body, and I think it is one that has great worth, and that is that I cannot stand up and insult the citizens of North Carolina, the citizens of Utah, or the citizens of Alabama. We have had Senators called down for that. Why do we have that rule? We have that rule because we do not want to pit our citizens against each other.

We could stand here and throw gasoline on misunderstandings, inflame things, and do great damage.

For the first time in the history of the Nation we are debating international affairs on radio where foreigners may listen to it. And so what do we do? We wind up insulting them.

I do not think they can appreciate the niceties of tactical advantage. But the end result is going to be the same, and that is that we will stir unusual acrimony in this area.

I suggest that maybe we should have a rule in this Senate that when we debate foreign affairs we cannot insult the citizens of another nation and that we cannot speak disrespectfully against the head of state of another nation, like we cannot speak disrespectfully against each other.

I think that that rule might be a very, very important rule for this Nation and for this Senate to conduct foreign policy.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's observations.

I, also, underscore that with free speech in the Senate of the United States each of the 100 Members of the Senate is free to make his presentation, to make his case, to make his appeal to reason or his appeal to emotion.

Mr. GRAVEL. But he cannot insult another Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. In any event, I think it is important to understand the free-speech principle that works in the Senate of the United State that each Senator has been elected by his people and is free to make his statements as he chooses to make them.

But I simply wanted to make that earlier reference to Shakespeare's play "Othello" because Iago by his words drove Othello to such extremes of emotion and jealousy that in the end Othello murdered Desdemona and then stabbed himself.

Mr. President, I see that the able distinguished Senator from Kansas is on the floor, and I know that he wants to be recognized to offer his amendment. Therefore, I yield the floor.

AMENDMENT NO. 10

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEAHY). Under the previous order, the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) is recognized to call up amendment No. 10 to article XII, which the clerk will state.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) for himself and Mr. CANNON proposes an amendment numbered 10.

In article XII, strike out paragraph 2. Renumber subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for debate on this amendment is limited to 2 hours to be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) and the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE).

The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, before commencing the debate on amendment No. 10, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH).

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

I just had to rise to my feet to chat a little bit concerning some of the comments that have been made over the last few minutes by the distinguished Senators from Maryland and Alaska.

I certainly have not heard the demeaning language pertaining in the people in Panama. There has been some language pertaining to the leader of Panama at this particular time, and frankly I think it depends on one's particular point of view whether than language is accurate or not.

I did enjoy the analogy of Othello-Desdemon, et al., in Othello. The important thing to take out of this is precisely what we have been talking about for actually better than a month now that is starting to come to fruition, and that is we said at the beginning of this debate that these treaties are an abomination, that they are not clear, that the Spanish translation means something to those in Panama that the English translation does not mean to us here, and vice versa. And now all of a sudden, after we have been told time and time again by the President, the ambassadors, the State Department, and others, the proponents of these treaties, that everything is going to be wonderful if we just ratify these treaties, that the Panamanians believe exactly the way we do and we believe exactly the way they do, and all we have to do is ratify these wonderful treaties and everything is just going to be a beautiful state here in this hemisphere as a result of it, here we find over the weekend that they do not seem to understand these treaties the same way we do. They have raised the hue and cry not over the language which has been used in the Senate, because I do not know anyone who has demeaned the people of Panama—in fact, I said on the floor of the Senate that I loved the people from Panama and of Panama—but the fact of the matter is that what has been said is that we are not going to have a wonderful state of nirvana because these treaties which were ambiguous, filled with ambiguity, fraught with translation difficulties, and filled with other difficulties are going to create more problems than they are going to solve if they are ratified.

As a matter of fact——

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I just have to say that——

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief question?

Mr. HATCH. I will finish in a second, and then I will be glad to yield.

I just want to say that I think the events of this past weekend are very interesting ones because the President, the ambassadors and others have told us we would have the unilateral right to intervene, we did not even need the leadership language; so Senator DECONCINI, who I found to be a very studious, hard-working, decent U.S. Senator from Arizona, has been vilified by the press back here because he sincerely brings forth a reservation, not an amendment, because the amendments were shot down and stonewalled, he brings forth a reservation to clarify the matter to make sure no one has any difficulties with that basic concept that we have the unilateral right to intervene to assure the neutrality of the canal. But what do we have but all kinds of disruption and discord because they did not understand it that way.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator not yield for a question?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRAVEL. If after we complete our work on the treaties——

Mr. HATCH. I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. If after we complete our work on the treaties the Panamanians choose to add reservations, as the Senate has added, to the treaties that were initialed by the head of state in Panama and the President of the United States, that is one step they may take. Now we, the Senate, have added to the Neutrality Treaty something new that the Panamanians were not aware of. Now, they may agree; they may not agree. But certainly it is their prerogative to do that.

Mr. HATCH. If they were not aware of it and were misled by the administration.

Mr. GRAVEL. Not misled. We are adding something new.

Mr. HATCH. We have.

Mr. GRAVEL. Why does my colleague say we have been misled?

Mr. HATCH. Because the President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 5 minutes that were yielded to the Senator from Utah have expired.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 2 additional minutes?

Mr. DOLE. I yield the Senator 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has 2 additional minutes.

Mr. GRAVEL. We added something new. The DeConcini amendment is something new to the treaty, so certainly the Panamanians are within their rights to voice an objection if they have one to that.

Mr. HATCH. And I agree with that.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is nothing new. No one has been misled or hoodwinked. We put new language on the table of negotiation, the Senate did, and they may well turn it down. Maybe they will not turn it down. Maybe they will add something new and it will come back to us. Certainly if they did that the Senator would not think that they would be duplicitous or hoodwinking us. This is the process.

If the Senate, in its wisdom, decided to add the DeConcini language, with which I disagree and which I think is horrible, but since we did it, now the Panamanians have every right to stand up and say, "Hey, we think that is bad language. We don't want it."

If I were a citizen of Panama and had to vote on this treaty, the Neutrality Treaty, with the DeConcini language, as a citizen of Panama I would vote "No." I would not take that kind of stuff.

Mr. HATCH. If I might reply, I think the distinguished Senator from Alaska has made my point for me, and I want to compliment him for it.

The basic point is they have not known what our President has been telling us is assured, and what the Ambassador said, and told us time and time again, that we would have the unilateral right to intervene to assure the neutrality of the canal after the year 2000.

Mr. GRAVEL. Our President did not assure them that we in the Senate would violate the U.N. charter, that we in the Senate would not——

Mr. HATCH. Wait a minute.

Mr. GRAVEL (continuing). Violate the U.N. pact.

Mr. HATCH. There is no violation of the U.N. charter here. If you will recall, just 3 weeks ago I stood on this floor and said they would hide behind the U.N. charter, exactly what they are doing now, only they have waited——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 2 minutes have expired.

Mr. HATCH. May I have 2 more additional minutes?

Mr. DOLE. Two more minutes.

Mr. HATCH. That is exactly what they are doing. I think many of the things we have talked about on this floor—it is amazing to me—are coming to pass before we even get through with the debate.

I suppose the only citizens, since we are not going to insult citizens of other States, and I appreciate the Senator's saying this, and I do not expect really that any Senator intends to insult any citizen of any other nation, and certainly not the Panamanians who have been our friends for years, I suppose the only people, the only citizens we can insult are the citizens from our own States when we ignore the overwhelming weight of their belief that we should not ratify these treaties, and even that is a question in my mind.

All we can say is what we have been talking about that these treaties are not clear not only to us but to the Panamanians, I think, is coming to fruition over this weekend, and I think we ought to all wake up and realize that to shoot down valid and decent amendments which could make this treaty worthwhile and stand up and not be the future cause of all kinds of difficulties is certainly the better approach, and the approach of the distinguished Senator from Arizona who brought forth a decent amendment and fought for it and got it enacted, one of the few which has been accepted not only by the President but by the State Department, the ambassadors and, of course, a majority of our colleagues in the Senate, and I compliment him for it.

I thank the Senator from Kansas. I thank him very much for the time he has given me.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Amendment No. 10 is offered on behalf of the Senator from Kansas, the Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON), the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. HANSEN), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from Utah (Mr. GARN).

Now, the amendment is very simple. The amendment would simply strike paragraph 2 of article XII from the Panama Canal Treaty. I might say to the distinguished Senator from Alaska I think he has a rather deep interest in this amendment, as I will point out in just a few moments.

In effect, it would remove the restriction that prevents the United States from negotiating with any country other than Panama for the right to construct a new interoceanic canal in the Western Hemisphere.

At the same time, this amendment would eliminate the corresponding provision which purports to prevent Panama from allowing any country other than the United States to build a new canal through her territory.

In just a few minutes I shall explain why the elimination of these two provisions would, in my opinion, be particularly advantageous to the United States.

At the same time, there is reason to believe that the Government of Panama would not object to removing these provisions from the treaty.

At the outset, the Senator from Kansas should say that he personally perceives little prospect for the construction of a new interoceanic canal in the Western Hemisphere during the remainder of this century. I have been among those who believe the present canal is still adequate and vital to our naval defense system. Only 14 U.S. aircraft carriers, a very small percentage of our Navy, cannot transit the present canal. So the need for a new canal during the remainder of this century is not evident to this Senator.

It should be remembered that it was President Carter, not the leader of the Panamanian Government, and not anyone else, who got this controversy underway last August when he suggested during an appearance in Yazoo City that a new sea-level interoceanic canal was under consideration.

So apparently the prospect, at least, exists.

General Torrijos has said, and the Carter administration has admitted, that it was our negotiators who first initiated the proposal found in paragraph 2, article XII. As a matter of fact, General Torrijos gives my colleague from Alaska, Senator GRAVEL, credit for promoting the plan. In a speech on nationwide Panamanian television last October 20, General Torrijos made the following statement with respect to article XII of the Panama Canal Treaty:

. . . there is a great deal of interest in the United States . . .

The Senator from Alaska is the one most interested in this sea-level canal because Alaska has become a great source of petroleum with possibilities that go far beyond the petroleum produced in the continental U.S. territory. The Alaska senator said: Omar, if you sign this letter I can get from the Senate 7 million balboas—

I think he meant 7 billion balboas—

so that jointly with you—when I say I am thinking about who I am going to appoint, I am thinking of the Polytechnical Institute, I am thinking of the best trained Panamanian minds in ecology, in engineering, in canal problems—let us begin to make this study now. This study should cost $7 million: $3 million for ecology, $3 million for engineering and another for something else.

Now, the Senator from Kansas does not agree with the Carter administration that the purported quid pro quo found in article XII, paragraph 2, is advantageous to the United States. This is why I and many of my colleagues believe the provision should be removed to protect our options and flexibility on this score.

After studying the ratifications of this portion of the treaty I have identified three major flaws in paragraph 2. I think, first of all, we ought to understand what paragraph 2 says, and I quote paragraph 2:

2. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree on the following:

(a) No new interoceanic canal shall be constructed in the territory of the Republic of Panama during the duration of this Treaty, except in accordance with the provisions of this Treaty, or as the two Parties may otherwise agree; and

(b) During the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall not negotiate with third States for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree.

Now, Mr. President, I believe these commitments are far more advantageous to Panama than the United States, and I must suggest to those who may have an interest that certainly we understand the interest of the Panamanians and this Senator understands the concern of the Panamanian people. But I suggest that our first responsibility is to the people of the United States of America. Certainly we have no right or, as far as I know, any willingness or any desire to insult anyone. But sometimes I think we insult the American people by what we do in this body and what we fail to do in this body, even though we may gloss over it with some high-sounding theory or something about colonialism. But as far as this Senator is concerned, we are still grappling with a very basic issue.

This treaty represents the last chance the American people have on the Panama Canal. This is the giveaway.

Now, some will say that we have never owned it; it is pretty difficult to understand how we can give it away. But this treaty says, "Give the Canal to Panama." It says, "Give them the control, the maintenance, and the operation"—though I assume for the next several years, at least, the American taxpayers will be called upon to spend millions and millions of dollars of their tax money to maintain and operate it.

When I focus on this one provision, I cannot for the life of me understand why it is in the treaty. It certainly is not advantageous to American interests. I hear all the talk about all the effort that has been made in the Senate to somehow denigrate the Panamanian Government or the leader of Panama, or the Panamanian people themselves. Well, I just suggest that as far as this provision is concerned, it is certainly advantageous to the Panamanian Government. It is certainly advantageous to General Torrijos, who is a dictator, there is no question about that. I do not think you insult a man by calling him what he is.

But how are these provisions advantageous to the Panamanian Government?

First, the American commitment is unequivocal: we may not negotiate with any country other than Panama for a new canal site, unless Panama specifically authorizes us to do so. The Panamanian commitment, on the other hand, is imprecise and certainly open to different interpretations. The popular interpretation, promoted by the Carter administration, is that subparagraph 2(a) protects us by preventing any other nation from building a new canal through Panama without our consent. But, strictly speaking, that is not precisely what this section says. I will read it again:

No new interoceanic canal shall be constructed in the territory of the Republic of Panama during the duration of this treaty, except in accordance with the provisions of this treaty, or as the two parties may otherwise agree. . . .

The provisions of this treaty, if anything, emphasize repeatedly that Panama shall exercise complete sovereignty and jurisdiction over her own territory. Would Panama, then, feel obligated to get consent from the United States if she were made a tempting offer for a new canal by a third nation? It seems very doubtful.

In fact, there is concrete evidence that the Panamanian Government considers this provision to only give the United States a "first option" for construction of a new canal in Panama. During the same television address on October 20, 1977, General Torrijos proclaimed:

In the treaty we give priority, not exclusiveness—

These are Torrijos' words, not mine, not those of the Senator from Alaska, but those of General Torrijos. He says:

In the treaty we give priority, not exclusiveness, for the building of a sea-level canal.

I continue to quote. He says:

The United States is given the first option.

Not a right, but an option.

Based on this statement by General Torrijos, the Panamanian interpretation is this: If, during the next 22 years, the Soviet Union or Saudi Arabia should offer to build a new canal through Panama, and if Panama agrees that it is a good idea, they will notify the United States that we have a "first option" to undertake the construction. If we for any reason do not take that option at the time it is offered, we forfeit our right, and Panama may let any other nation construct a new canal.

It should be emphasized—I think this is the key—that we do not have this same "first option" right the other way around. That is, the treaty does not permit us to negotiate with a third country for a new canal if Panama rejects our first offer. So they have the best of both worlds, as they have nearly all the way in this treaty, as far as the Senator from Kansas is concerned.

Mr. President, the second major flaw is this: Even if the United States does decide it wants to build a new canal in Panama during the next 22 years, Panama is under no obligation to permit it. My colleagues should note that article XII does not guarantee the United States a unilateral right to decide to build a new canal in Panama. In such a situation, we are stuck with the fact that we cannot build a new interoceanic canal anywhere other than Panama, and yet we cannot build the canal in Panama because Panama objects.

So we are really boxed in. That is certainly a great feat of negotiation . I do not know how we were able to do it. But of course if you look at the other provisions in the treaty it is understandable.

This very real concern is not without foundation. Panamanian chief negotiator Escobar Bethancourt told the Panamanian National Assembly last August that article XII,

> As you can see, is not even an option to build a sea-level canal. It is an option to promise to study the viability of it. That is the true option. The true commitment is to sit down with the United States to study whether or not it is viable to build a sea-level canal. If the two countries feel it is viable, then they will sit down to negotiate the terms agreed on by the two countries.

Would Panama likely agree to such a U.S. proposal? General Torrijos told a Time Magazine correspondent last August:

> The treaty will say that we will discuss the possibility of a new sea-level canal if it is in the joint interest of the world community to build it. But my personal opinion is that a sea-level canal is not necessary. Such a canal would be excessively costly, and you can't build it in two weeks either. We do not want it—even wrapped in plastic.

This is General Torrijos speaking.

To sum it up, the United States is out of luck, if we decide to build a new sea-level canal, and Panama refuses to cooperate.

The third major flaw is that no other country in the world is bound, as the United States will be, from constructing a new interoceanic canal anywhere it wants in the Western Hemisphere. For example, if a canal route through Nicaragua should look useful for any reason in, say 1990, the Soviet Union or the Arabs could build it—the United States could not because of this commitment in article XII. We would not even have the ability to compete for the construction rights.

Why should we voluntarily bind ourselves in this regard, as no other nation in the world is bound?

I hope that we will have some light shed on this matter, because we search in vain for an explanation; but there is none.

For all of these reasons, the commitment in article XII, paragraph 2—which was promoted by the Carter administration, based on an off-the-cuff statement made by the President at a town meeting in Yazoo City, Miss.—should be eliminated. The committee was made and promoted by the Carter administration, not by the Panamanians. It is detrimental to the interest of the United States, and it should be removed from the treaty.

I think in addition, Mr. President, two other points should be discussed which are relevant to this argument. First, I think most Americans would agree it is ludicrous to even think of building a new canal in Panama, after all the grief we have been given over the present one. We paid for it, we constructed it, we have maintained it, we have operated it, we have paid all the costs, and I think many Americans have had about enough of this kind of diplomacy. We are about to give away property, the replacement value of which is estimated at between $5 billion and $8 billion.

It seems strange that we were debating a bill this morning trying to help the American farmer, and the administration said, "No, no, we won't do anything for the American farmer."

We were met by one objection after another from the Budget Committee. Where is the Budget Committee on the Panama Canal? What inflationary impact will giving away an $8 billion property have on the United States? What about the American consumer? Where are all these arguments that were made against the poor helpless American farmer this morning?

Oh, we went through arm twisting, inaccurate statements, inaccurate charges, heavy lobbying all over the country, everyone in the administration trying to shoot down the American farmer. But where are those people now?

All the American farmer has—it is not a giveaway program as we have in this proposal, but a chance to make a profit in the marketplace.

I will say to the credit of the distinguished floor leader on this measure, the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), that he was there with the American farmer. He was supporting the American farmer. He did not listen to the administration. His arm was not twisted. And many other Democrats voted for the farm bill this morning.

You sometimes wonder, as you sit in the galleries and listen to isolated debates, what may be happening in America. If you were there this morning and listened to all the arguments against the farm bill, and all the great alleged costs it was going to put on the American consumer and the American taxpayer, and still there are no voices raised against this giveaway, you wonder which side we are on in this Chamber.

Are we concerned about the American taxpayers, the American consumer, the American farmer? I think it is all very relevant, because we sort of get carried away. We are debating the Panama Canal Treaty now, not the farm bill. Well, we are debating a principle. We are debating a principle of who comes first. In this case it was not the American taxpayer, it was not the American farmer. I assume that everything that could be done was done to defeat the farm bill this morning in the Senate. For what reason? So the President would not have to veto the bill, to protect the President of the United States, who apparently does not want to help the American farmer.

I just suggest, as we get into the final phase of debate on this giveaway program, we ought to take a look at what we are doing for the American people. This provision does not do anything for the American taxpayer, the American voter, the American citizen. I just cannot understand the reason this provision was ever put into the treaty in the first place. We are going to find out quickly, because the Senator from Alaska, apparently, was the initiator of this provision. He should have firsthand knowledge on why President Carter made the statement at Yazoo City, why President Carter made the commitment and why it is in writing, why it is in the treaty. We ought to have the answers to those questions.

It is really difficult to explain why we give Panama the advantage time after time after time. They are a small country and we are a large country. We understand that. We are friends of the Panamanian people and have been for a long, long time. That does not mean we have to embrace Torrijos, the dictator. That does not mean we cannot disagree with Torrijos, the dictator. That should not insult Torrijos.

He is the ruler of Panama, but I do not know of any free elections which have been held there recently. Maybe somebody can enlighten the American people on this matter.

Mr. GRAVEL. They had a plebiscite.

Mr. DOLE. They had a plebiscite, but not on Torrijos.

I will give the Senator ample opportunity to respond, because I am waiting with baited breath to hear him tell us how he got this into the treaty.

We have had an experience in the past few days where it is very obvious that the Panamanian people are upset about the DeConcini reservation. Maybe they should be. It is a tough reservation. The Senator from Kansas offered an amendment which would have done the same thing. I did not offer it in a hostile way. I offered it as a friend, as another step in trying to preserve the neutrality of the canal. I cannot understand this very delayed reaction from Panama, why it took a couple of weeks for any reaction from Panama. Apparently there is not the understanding we have been told there is; there is not the understanding we have been led to believe there is.

I would guess that if the votes had been there, the administration may have fought the DeConcini reservation tooth and toenail, but they needed his vote.

They needed a couple of other votes which may have hinged on the DeConcini reservation.

We understand that there may be two high-ranking Panamanian officials in town right now trying to straighten out the controversy, the misunderstanding. I hope the floor leaders will enlighten us on that. If those officials are here, maybe some of the rest of us would have a chance to visit with them.

I would just suggest that somehow we seem to have our priorities mixed up. I think the American people would share the view that it is rather ridiculous to talk about spending $7 billion for another canal. I do not think many American taxpayers would understand the reason to build another canal, after we have agreed under pressure to give away the old one. I am certain some in this Chamber might think if we are to build a new one we ought to give it away, too. It does not make any sense. Most of us agree it does not make any sense.

Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, during testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on October 14 of last year, commented:

> I, myself, have raised the question whether it is wise to place two canals in the same country—we have enough problems with one of them there—and whether it might not be better to have a sea level canal, if we build it, in some other country.

Suppose even for a moment we did decide to build a new canal through Panama. The simple laws of diplomacy and good business sense tell us our leverage in determining costs and conditions would be severely diminished. Since we have no place else to go to build the canal, we have no bargaining leverage, and Panama has no real incentive to try to accommodate us. On the other hand if the United States were free to join with a third nation—but we are not as that right has been given up in this treaty. Why has it been given up? I do not know, but we hope to find out.

But if we were free to join with a third nation for a competitive enterprise it would be much easier to obtain an agreement from Panama. This is not taking advantage of Panama. It just makes good, common sense. If you want to make some business arrangement, you try to apply the proper leverage. I guess it demonstrates again how foolish it would be to voluntarily bind ourselves in advance, but that is what we have done.

We are going to be hearing the old, tired arguments that we cannot amend the treaty, we cannot change anything, we cannot add one word, because that might mean a new plebiscite. I think many Americans wonder why they have not yet had their first plebiscite. Panama had one and the American people have not had one. We are on the giving end. Panama barely has enough votes to take the $7 billion gift. The American people were not even asked if they wanted to vote to give it away. Panama has a little different form of government, I understand.

I would say, Mr. President, all of the elements of good sense suggest that we should eliminate this provision from the treaty. We ought to do it in a straightforward way so there is no misunderstanding, as we have had in the past.

I know somebody will offer a reservation later on and we will be told how they will take the reservation. That will satisfy someone who objects to this provision. That will keep them in line, maybe, for the final vote. But we have seen what can happen on reservations, how much confusion can spread across the land and into Panama.

Why not, just by simple amendment, delete this offensive provision from article XII? It would be very simple. Just cut it out. Torrijos would understand it, the Senate would understand it, the Panamanian people would understand it, President Carter would understand it, and the American people might understand it. The American people have not been given much opportunity to understand much of this treaty, because they have been hearing, if they listened to the radio:

> We cannot take your amendment. That would do violence to the treaty. It is not necessary. We understand what is best.

One amendment after another has been voted down or tabled, killed, except for the leadership amendment.

Then we got into the crunch of how many votes were needed to actually pass that Neutrality Treaty. Then they made a few arrangements, or a few arrangements were made, to pick up this vote and that vote. Then they had the magic number, with one to spare.

We were told that everything was fine, except for the unexpected assist from General Torrijos who is getting a lot of pressure, I understand, in Panama and finally had to speak out.

It would seem to me that if there is that much confusion, if it is causing General Torrijos that much of a domestic political problem, the best thing we can do to this second treaty is to recommit it to the Foreign Relations Committee, and either clarify the language or let it rest there until there is a meeting of the minds between Panama, the Government of Panama, and the leaders of America on just what we have here.

I am certain that is going to be rejected, too, because we do not want to do anything to clarify the problem; we want to keep it fuzzed up until after we vote next Tuesday. Then we shall try to figure out some way to take care of it.

We have spent a lot of time on this debate. Many of us have learned a great deal. I think we have had adequate debate. The point is now that we have a great misunderstanding.

I say with reference to this simple amendment, it is straightforward, it is effective, it is pretty hard to construe it any other way if we just knock it out. We do not have the problem we had with the DeConcini reservation: the way I interpret it, the way you interpret it. We just take it out. It is out. That seems very simple and straightforward, not trying to deceive anyone.

I, frankly, do not think the Panamanian Government would object. They did not bring it up. It was brought up by this administration. It was not being considered in the previous administration, in the Ford administration. In fact, one way to rehabilitate Torrijos now may be to drop this amendment, because he said, as the Senator from Alaska knows, if we drop this out, he will be a "national hero."

He needs our help and you are one of the leaders in efforts to help General Torrijos. This is your opportunity to cosponsor this amendment, an act of political grace and courage, because General Torrijos has suggested he would be a "national hero" among the Panamanian people if this provision were dropped from the treaty.

Panama cannot accept the DeConcini reservation, because of all it means, all the implications to Panama. Many Panamanians do not like this quid pro quo argument, either. So we are going to get that old, wornout excuse. They are going to say that the amendment is not relevant. We are going to be told this would upset the Panamanian Government. It would not. This is one thing that would probably make the Panamanian Government happy.

I understand the great strength and power and influence General Torrijos has over this treaty, either directly or indirectly. Here is one chance for those who have been voting against every amendment except the leadership amendment. one chance to really do something that the American people understand and the Panamanian people understand. And I hope that we will do it openly, above board, clearly, concisely, and effectively.

It has already been suggested that the Senate leadership may support a treaty reservation to the same effect. I do not know, perhaps we are going to see all those people who are going to stand up later and vote for the reservation trying to beat off this amendment. That is just how absurd the situation has become.

There could be only one possible rationale for doing that. They will argue that a treaty amendment might require a new plebiscite in Panama while a reservation would not. But since when has it been our responsibility, the responsibility of the U.S. Senate, to fret and worry about whether General Torrijos must hold another plebiscite? I do not see that in my oath of office. I do not see that in any instructions I have had as a Senator. I think our first obligation is with reference to the American interest, which does not do violence in this case to the Panamanian interest.

I think the problem is that we are getting down now to where the truth is starting to pinch a little. There is a great feeling, I think, in the Carter administration and the Torrijos administration that they cannot have another plebiscite. The Panamanian people might reject the treaties. So they are going to suggest that we just take this amendment, kill it, table it or do it outright, and do the same thing by reservation. I suggest, based on the experience with the DeConcini reservation, that maybe we are better off with an amendment.

We do not try to fool anybody with this amendment, but you are going to try to fool somebody with a reservation. We are not trying to have it both ways with this amendment, but you are going to suggest that we can have it both ways with this reservation. This is clean, concise minor surgery. It just takes it out.

I would think the distinguished Senator from Alaska, who has been supporting General Torrijos with great vigor, would support my amendment—as Torrijos says, this would make him a national hero if this is stricken out. It is a chance for any of us who may have said anything to offend General Torrijos on the floor to try to rehabilitate him, if that is necessary, because we shall all vote for it. That would, in effect, if it is necessary, absolve anyone in this body who might have, in the heat of passion or debate, made any reference to anyone that might be offensive. I do not recall any such comments being made.

I say, finally, Mr. President, that I hope that on an amendment of this significance, which the Panamanians do not want, which Torrijos does not want, which is put in the treaty on the basis of an off-the-cuff remark in Yazoo City in a town meeting, we can get an up or down vote. This is certainly one the American people understand.

I hope that we shall have at least five or six up or down votes in the course of this debate. To date, we have only had three up or down votes on this treaty. Out of all the amendments that have been offered, we have only been permitted to have three up or down votes. I think the American people want to see their Senators take a direct, yes or no stance on the issues. I hope we will be permitted a simple yes or no vote on this amendment.

Let me repeat in closing, Mr. President, that this is an amendment that, as I have indicated previously, is easily understood. It strikes out the section the Senator from Kansas referred to. It would do away with some of the flaws that I have referred to. It is clean, it is concise, it does the job, and I think it would take care of what I consider to be a mistake in the negotiations.

I would hope—I do not think—that maybe, with some reflection, the administration might be in a position to accept the amendment. It seems to me that if we are in trouble with Torrijos because of DeConcini, we could trade this one off. If he does not like this one, he would like to get rid of this out of article XII, and it would make him a "national hero." Maybe it would offset the damage that DeConcini has done to Torrijos. The proponents of the treaty could have the best of both worlds by accepting this simple amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I want to say that I really relish this opportunity to stand up here and engage in a colloquy, in a debate, with my good friend from Kansas. I have not had that opportunity—we both got elected to the Senate about the same time, and I have not had that opportunity since the early seventies. I have missed it, because he is a very, very gifted and articulate person, who can really express himself. We have not done it in a long time.

In fact, I can recall our last encounter together when he was defending President Thieu, of South Vietnam, and defending our presence and our staying in South Vietnam and how we had to keep fighting there. I can recall the two of us standing toe to toe, when he was defending the Richard Nixon administration over and over again. I have sort of missed those days. Now we have an opportunity to stand up again and relive our past encounters, and I am going to try to do a little bit of that this afternoon.

I do not want to say that he is accurate in his quotes. There is no question that there was no great enthusiasm on the part of the Panamanians for this section of the treaty. I may have been misquoted; I do not think I have ever claimed the power to appoint anybody. The only people I can appoint are people to my staff and I can "unappoint" them. That is the only power I have.

Mr. DOLE. I was just reading a quote by Torrijos.

Mr. GRAVEL. I appreciate that, and my colleague is a very accurate reader. There is no question about that.

I want to say that if there is really an initiator of this section, it is probably me. When I came upon certain relevant pieces of information, I felt it incumbent upon me to protect the U.S. interest, as I saw it, and pressed upon Ambassadors Bunker and Linowitz that they should get something in the treaty to safeguard what I thought was a very important interest to us, particularly so in my State, but not one ounce less to the rest of the Nation or, for that matter, the rest of the world.

So I pressed very hard and we succeeded on our side in making presentations, The Panamanians said, "If you people want something, we want something too, we want a quid pro quo," and that was agreed to.

I might add that my dear friend can read the language any way he wants, but that language is very well balanced.

The Senator is quite right on one point—that what we really agreed to do was study. That is what it is all about.

To talk about doing anything before we have the result from the study is quite ridiculous, because we do not know what we want to do or, if we want to do anything. What is important is to undertake this study.

Several Members of this body have cosponsored an amendment, or a bill, that would put up $7 million or $8 million to go further with this study. I think a lot of people see the wisdom of that. I think Senator GOLDWATER joined as a cosponsor, and Senator ALLEN was a cosponsor on that amendment. It was led by Senator MAGNUSON. That is, to go ahead and spend some money to update the earlier report.

We have already spent $22 million to find the best route—and this is what my colleague really has not focused on when he talks about Nicaragua, and these other options. I have that report in front of me. It is the interoceanic canal study of 1970, a study started in 1964 and completed in 1970, and this was a study that cost the American taxpayer $22 million.

The main accomplishment of the study was to look at all the possible sites for building a sea-level canal. They studied 30 of them, from Mexico to Colombia, and they narrowed down to four, two of which are in Panama, and then they narrowed to one, which is the viable, economic alternative if we are to build a sea-level canal, and it is in Panama. It is 10 miles due west of the present Panama Canal.

So we can say, academically, we need our freedom to be able to negotiate with somebody else. It is preposterous and it is ridiculous. We have already spent the money to study that.

We can say that we do not believe the people that work for us that make these studies. We can be Luddites, and not accept the fact that the choice was made of this location. That is the best economic choice.

We could go and do something uneconomic. That is quite possible. We have made that kind of mistake in the past. That, of course, is really the alternative that my colleague is talking about.

But why would we want to go do something uneconomic, or to another country—my colleague mentions Nicaragua.

It is very interesting that he should mention Nicaragua when he, along with several of our colleagues here, on February 17, 1971, voted to give back the unilateral option of building a canal in Nicaragua. He, along with 65 other Senators, voted for a treaty that gave back to Nicaraguans what they had given us on a silver platter, which was the right unilaterally to build a canal in Nicaragua, for perpetuity, I might add—forever.

We did not have to give that back except that the language of the treaty was so embarrassing that, after we had our economic study, we chose to give it back.

Mr. President, I would like to have printed in the RECORD at this point the convention with Nicaragua terminating the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty of 1914.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote, there are 66 yeas and 5 nays. Two-thirds of the Senators present and voting having voted in the affirmative, the resolution of ratification is agreed to.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, this Senate has already gone on record—66 votes, I might say—that if our technicians tell us it makes no economic sense in Nicaragua, then we should not keep a treaty in existence which gives us the right in perpetuity to build a canal in Nicaragua. We have already made that decision.

But as happens so often in this body, some people want to go back and reinvent the wheel.

Let me say, we have spent money to look for a possible location of where to build a sea-level canal. That location has been chosen. It is 10 miles to the West of the present canal. The question is, should we or should we not.

My colleague here is very interested in saying somewhat resentfully that we should have the right to go into Panama and build a canal anywhere we darn well please. That would be like saying France, Germany, or the Soviet Union should have the right to go through the United States, or to Kansas, and dig a ditch if they want to. We cannot even do that ourselves as a government. We, at least, have to have an environmental impact statement.

But that is a right some want to reserve for ourselves in Panama.

I think that is most unfortunate because, certainly he cannot mean that. He cannot mean that we would take unto ourselves prerogatives that as human beings we would not allow the Panamanians.

He cannot mean that because, certainly, we want to treat them as equally as we would treat ourselves.

The language in this treaty is balanced. It says that we will study the issue. Part says we cannot go and negotiate with somebody else in our hemisphere for a canal, which really means nothing because our technicians have already told us there is nobody to negotiate with to build a canal, no other location of economic value to build a canal.

So what are we giving up?

The charge was made that this is a giveaway. What have we given up? We have given up the right not to negotiate with somebody else we would never negotiate with, because we could never build anything in their country if we did negotiate with them.

We have not given up a thing.

What have the Panamanians given up? They said in this treaty, "we will study it with you."

I think that is very important. I do not think we should be studying anybody's country without their involvement.

So, they would study it with us and then we would begin to negotiate.

Here is what I would think is an intelligent context of these negotiations. It is very simple. That is, it is their land. We do not have any Bunau-Varilla running around to negotiate a new treaty.

So it is a new premise we start with. It is their land. It is just as if it was American soil and somebody said, "We're very interested in seeing you undertake some type of venture."

We would need their permission as equals.

As far as owning it, I do not think they would let anybody own it but ourselves. They would be foolish. They do not have to.

So they would own it. So it would be for their own interest, and that is very simple. It is a commercial interest.

We presently generate one-third of the present traffic through the canal. So, if the new canal were to be built we could assume we would generate one-third or more of the traffic in that canal. So it would be in our economic interest.

We would go to them, as a result of this study, if the study were affirmative. We would simply say to them, "Well, we are prepared to help you finance this in exchange for a proper toll rate."

We would have what would be essentially a commercial undertaking with the government and with the people of Panama. That is all. It is not terribly complex. We do that now with other countries. With Canada we will have a gas line. It will come down from Alaska into the United States, go through a foreign country. They have not ceded their sovereignty over that land. We just worked out a commercial arrangement that was sanctified by a resolution in this body that will permit shipment of gas from one part of the United States to the other part of the United States.

It is a very simple undertaking when we strip away all of this false emotion that has beset this unusual situation.

Let me touch briefly again on these other countries involved, because we get so upset, some people do, at least, that we would be building a new canal through a country that would have a general at the head of it.

I might suggest that Nicaragua, where Mr. Somoza is in charge, has had a few difficulties of late. Maybe they are advocating, as some do, that Nicaragua is a possibility.

I could go down the list of countries involved. All these countries were party to the agreement between President Carter and Mr. Torrijos. So they all were party to the understanding that probably the best location and the only location for a canal is in Panama. That is what all the heads of state agreed to when they signed along with the treaty on the declaration of Washington, last September.

Let us now go to certain premises of my colleague. He does not foresee the need for a canal in this century.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a clarification? I do not want to interrupt his statement.

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield for a clarification. I tried to clarify the statement of the Senator from Kansas a couple of times, but I would be happy to have him clarify, also.

Mr. DOLE. I did not see the Senator from Alaska standing, to clarify it. It probably needed clarifying.

The Senator from Alaska mentioned that these other countries signed on. It is my understanding that they only signed on so far as the Neutrality Treaty was concerned, not the treaty we are debating now.

Mr. GRAVEL. I believe the declaration of Washington was with reference to the whole package, which consisted of two treaties. They did not actually sign these documents. They had another declaration saying they were essentially in favor of what we were doing with Panama.

Mr. DOLE. They were in favor of it.

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. I do not quarrel with that.

Mr. GRAVEL. When my colleague was talking about the defense argument, that 14 carriers cannot go through the canal and that is not a big part of Navy, so far as I am concerned, that is all our Navy. I think the Second World War demonstrated that. The Second World War, at sea, was won with carriers, with aircraft carriers. That was it. If you have no aircraft carriers, you literally have no Navy. So to say that our 14 carriers cannot go through the Panama Canal is saying that the American maritime defense capability cannot go through the Panama Canal. That is what you are saying. Do not kid yourself.

These carriers are the most vital things we have. We are not going to let a carrier run around the ocean without a few destroyers—like 10 of them. That means that whenever you move a carrier around the Cape of South America, you are going to move 10 destroyers to protect that carrier, which is still vulnerable because it will not have its entire task group with it.

So I hope my colleague will be a little more accurate and a little less cavalierish about our defense posture, because I know he has a distinguished record in this regard, with respect to a very strong defense posture for this country.

Be that as it may, I think any judgment about the new canal is primarily an economic decision. Economics is the discipline to which we subject all our decisions with respect to the distribution of resources and the determination of productivity.

Let us look at the situation today. Today, 57 percent of the world maritime tonnage cannot go through the present Panama Canal. To be more accurate, 57.8 percent of the vessels in the world maritime fleet are of 60,000 dead weight tons or more, and the limitation of the present canal is between 60,000 and 70,000 dead weight tons. From an economic point of view that means the canal is more than 50 percent obsolete.

You can bury your head in the sand and only worry about the emotion—who has sovereignty and who does not have sovereignty; this is a giveaway and that is a giveaway. All that is quite irrelevant to the simple fact that the canal is more than 50 percent obsolete today. I do not think that figure, prior to the research that I presented here, was generally known or appreciated.

That is the reason why a person, whether it be a Panamanian or an American in high office, who is not acquainted with these facts cannot develop a very acute—in my opinion—understanding of the present relevance of the present canal or what the needs will be 10 and 20 years from now. But I think we can take the experience of the last 12 years and compute what those figures are and what they show.

What we see is that in 1966, 89.59 percent of the world maritime fleet, in terms of tonnage, could go through the Panama Canal. Ten years later, in 1976, it was 42.2 percent. Of course, today it is 57.8 percent.

If we projected that to the year 2000 and only used a third of the last 12 years experience—not the full experience, only a third of it—we see that by the year 2000, about 7.64 percent of the world maritime fleet would be able to use the canal.

If that is not an indication that the barrier of Panama, the Isthmus of Panama, is increasing for world maritime interests, I do not know what is. If you come to the conclusion that this barrier is rising and increasing every year, then you must come to the conclusion that we should make a decision that was made back in 1903, which was made back in 1880 in Europe, in 1850 in the United States—that we have to try to find a way to breach that Isthmus for the benefit of the world commercial trade. That is the simple conclusion you come to.

We can be rational people and take statistics such as these and say that something is wrong and we should do something about it, or we can wait until the year 2000, when less than 10 percent of the world maritime fleet can use the canal, and say, "We have to do something about it now. We have to build a new sea-level canal."

We can wait until that time, but I submit that we are rational and intelligent human beings, and I think we can get together with the Panamanians and perform the necessary studies and in those studies make an economic decision as to whether or not we should go forward. If it is not justifiable on economics alone, we may choose to add defense considerations. That would be up to the Senate, at a certain point in time, if it chooses.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I yield.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont has a couple of questions that come to mind in looking at this amendment.

As I understand the provision in the treaty, a treaty that was negotiated by, among others, a distinguished fellow Vermonter, Ellsworth Bunker, the country of Panama is precluded from negotiating with anybody other than the United States on the question of a sea level canal in Panama during the remainder of the century. Is that correct?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am sorry. Will the Senator repeat that?

Mr. LEAHY. As I understand the treaty, as it was signed, Panama is not allowed to negotiate for a sea level canal through Panama with any other country except the United States.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is right.

Mr. LEAHY. It is also a fair understanding that Panama, from an engineering point of view, is ideally the place for a sea level canal, if one were to be built.

Mr. GRAVEL. The most ideal.

I should like to quote a gentleman I know and respect, Mr. John Sheffey, a retired colonel of the U.S. Army. He was the Executive Director of the Inter-Oceanic Canal Study Commission, which completed its report in 1970. I read from his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee:

> First, as the former executive director of the $22 million Sea-Level Canal Study of 1965–1970. I assure you that there are no foreseeable circumstances in which the United States would be likely to consider building a new isthmian canal outside Panama. The only feasible routes are in Panama.

So I think the case is very clear.

When my colleague from Kansas talks about that we have to have our options or we are giving away something, it is absolutely preposterous that we would be giving away something. We are not giving away something. There is the only place to put a canal.

Mr. LEAHY. If we remove this section in the treaty, then that means that Panama is free to negotiate immediately with any other country for a sea level canal, that is, with Japan, the Common Market, the Soviet Union, or anyone; is that correct?

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes, they could, if this treaty were to pass. If the treaties do not pass, then I think that some of my colleagues will probably stand up here and say their rights under the 1903 treaty would preclude that.

Mr. LEAHY. Assuming we ratify the treaties as they are before us but follow the Dole amendment as it is before the Senate, if we ratify the treaties but also accepted the Dole amendment, then Panama would be free to negotiate with any other country in the world?

Mr. GRAVEL. The answer to the Senator's question, I think, is yes.

Mr. LEAHY. I tell my friend from Alaska that I have concern when I hear people talk about this section, and I will tell the Senator, if I could impose on his time for a couple of minutes, that in comments I have heard in Vermont and in other parts of the country, people ask us why we would have this in here, why we would allow ourselves to be restricted to negotiate only with Panama, or vice versa. I find when people ask this there is almost a huge blind spot that takes us back perhaps to the days of Teddy Roosevelt, or before, a feeling on the part of some that we could just go ahead and if we decide we want to build a sea level canal in Panama just go down and build one. I wonder if people have listened to any part of the debate that we have had here for the last several months, that we are dealing with a sovereign, proud, responsible, respectable country, Panama.

Mr. GRAVEL. Yes.

Mr. LEAHY. And Panama's main assets, of course, are its geographical location and its land.

Mr. GRAVEL. If my colleague will permit, I know why he runs into this misunderstanding throughout the country: We have a Senator of the United States standing on this floor saying, respectfully, he does not know why we do not have that right, just as if it is normal for us whenever we so feel to go dig a ditch in somebody's backyard.

Mr. LEAHY. I think one of the things that I would hope would finally come out of this debate is that the United States does not feel and should not feel that it owns Panama, certain actions in the past to the contrary notwithstanding, that we are indeed dealing with a proud country, with a country that has diligently maintained and lived up to a treaty that they themselves resent and have resented almost from the day it was signed but yet have shown honesty and integrity in living up to it. I really hope that the debate on this particular item, whether it is in this amendment or is an understanding later, does not break down into the kind of argument that we heard throughout the land in differing parts that would seem to have shown an assumption on the part of some people of the United States that if we decide we want to build a sea level canal simply because we might have the technical expertise to do so in Panama then we just go right down and build it irrespective of how Panama might feel.

We should realize than even in the present Panama Canal if Panama decided to bleed off the major part of the watershed of Lake Gatun, and they could do that as part of that is outside of the Canal Zone, we could not operate it anyway. We would lose the 52 million gallons it takes for transit of the canal, every single transit.

Mr. GRAVEL. For each vessel.

Mr. LEAHY. And by the same token, on the building of a sea level canal, assuming that it would become a matter of economic viability or necessity, it is Panama that possesses the primary ingredient, it is Panama whose country will be utilized, and it is Panama that has the most at stake there.

I think that it would be the height of arrogance on the part of the United States to assume that we and we alone would decide whether there would be another canal through Panama. Panama and Panama alone can make that ultimate decision.

But I personally prefer the situation where if they are going to make such a decision they would make it jointly with the United States and not make it with the Common Market, Japan, the Soviet Union, or anyone else. Yet I worry that there seems to be pressure built up in the country that rushes us pellmell into a situation where they are free to make that kind of arrangement with anyone else they want.

Mr. GRAVEL. I wish to thank my colleague because he underscored one important thing which is at total variance with my colleague from Kansas, and that is that a sea level canal will be the ultimate decision of Panama, not the United States. It will involve us but the ultimate decision will be that of Panama.

The language we have in this treaty, in my view, is no more than a mutual expression of enlightened self-interest. How horrible it would be, or how really ridiculous it would be, for the United States unilaterally to withdraw its expression from what is in its actual interests. All we are saying here is that the United States will not negotiate with anyone else, which would not make any sense even if it wanted to negotiate with someone else. And the Panamanians say that they will not negotiate with anyone else because, in point of fact, just like it makes no sense for us to turn elsewhere, it really makes no sense for the Panamanians in the final decision to turn elsewhere.

For my colleague to stand up here and say the Soviet Union would go negotiate with Panama to build a sea level canal—can one imagine the ridiculous scenario of the Soviet Union which in 1969—those are the figures I readily have available—had going through the Panama Canal only .2 percent of the traffic, as opposed to the United States, which had 15.8 percent of the traffic?

It is preposterous to think that the Soviet Union will be so ignorant as to want to waste $10 billion or more building a canal that we could unilaterally make a decision not to use. That means that they would sit there with an investment that would be ridiculous.

So obviously any financing of a new sea level canal is not going to be hidebound by the nationalism and the jingoism of past decades. It is going to be a calculated economic venture. So since the United States is the most important user of the Panama Canal, or the would-be sea level canal, I do not envision as possible that a sea level canal could be built without our involvement. The nature of that involvement would be in terms of helping with the financing of the canal. I would hope that a new sea level canal, if it is warranted economically, would be financed by every nation that used it. That is how it should be financed. It would be international in charter. It would be owned by the Panamanian people, and the Panamanian people, hopefully, would make a handsome profit from this productive instrument that would lie within their country.

Why a Member of this body would want to stand up and say first, this is a give away and second, we ought to just plain take out this language altogether and make out this does not exist, I do not understand. It can only be, regardless of the statements he was quoting from the head of state of Panama, Mr. Torrijos, it could only mean that the tactic is still today what it was yesterday, and that is to load these treaties up with so much that they will just fall over of their own weight and they will not be acceptable. That is the tactic. That is what it has been from the very beginning, and that is what it is now, regardless of the protestations that are made.

But let me submit I think the people of this country and the people of Panama are a little more intelligent than what this amendment would suggest they are, and they are intelligent enough to recognize their enlightened self-interest. I think that in order to make that enlightened self-interest known they are prepared to go forward with a study, and when the self-interest is determined as a result of that study, they are prepared to go into what would be commercial negotiations to bring this about.

All of what this section of the treaty does is to frame that future activity, to put it into a frame, so that when the study is in, the United States knows it is not looking over its shoulder to alternatives, and Panama knows it is not looking over its shoulder to alternatives. The two major beneficiaries of a possible sea-level canal would obviously sit down and work out the situation at that point in time.

Again I do not understand why anybody would want to stand on this floor and say, "Let us take out all this language about a sea-level canal. Let us just pretend it does not exist," and try to go back and look at Nicaragua, maybe spend another $22 million looking all over.

I would hope my colleague would join me in spending $8 million to update the study we have to get the present economics, update the engineering, and do an environmental study. After that we would know whether or not we should build a sea-level canal. I do not know whether we should or not. All I know is that I brought forward evidence to indicate that it would be economically viable and that it is needed.

It is particularly needed for my State. We are the treasurehouse of the United States of America. We have one-third of the known oil reserves of the United States, and we cannot get that energy to market efficiently today.

In fact, we are paying more than a dollar a barrel over what it would cost if a sea level canal were in existence today. Imagine that. I have heard exclamation upon exclamation on the floor of the Senate as to the high price of energy. If we had a sea level canal today, what is selling for $14 a barrel would be $13 a barrel, and it would be American oil at that, and would not have to import it from other countries causing a balance of payments deficit. That is just our oil.

Then we get our gas. There is not a liquefied gas tanker in the world today that can go through the Panama Canal. Not one. Obviously, if we are to use the gas potential of Alaska, which is enormous, the only way we are going to do it is with a sea level canal.

We talk about coal. Coal is the second most important commodity going through the present canal, and that is coal that goes from the East coast of the United States out of Hampton Roads, Va., and goes over to Japan. We could get a better price for our coal and more jobs for our people—my colleague is very concerned about that—and a better price for our coal if we could ship it more efficiently, meaning the larger vessels. We cannot do that. We are restricted in the size of the vessels because of the size of the present canal.

I could go on and make case after case, but if it is not clear let me restate it one more time: Fifty-seven percent of the world's tonnage cannot go through the Panama Canal today. That is a change from what it was 12 years ago. Twelve years ago almost 90 percent could go through the Panama Canal. We cannot be oblivious to that simple fact, that in 12 short years there has been an unbelievable obsolescence taking place. What will happen in the next 20 years? That is the simple question that I ask, and in order to try to find out I have pressed to have some language put in this treaty that will accommodate a study by the United States and Panama, and when that study is in it will speed the negotiations between Panama and ourselves.

To me that sounds very reasonable. It sounds very logical, and if somebody would stand on the floor of the Senate and say, "Take all that language out and let us just concentrate on the present Panama Canal because it is going to last forever," well, I say the facts do not substantiate that. And the facts, I think, have to either be refuted—or people just have to stand in the dock and be judged by the American people for the ridiculousness of their proposals.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. RIEGLE). The Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE.)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank my distinguished colleague.

I might join him in supporting additional money for updating the study, assuming we could satisfy the environmentalists and, perhaps, we will need an environmental impact statement. But the Senator from Kansas, of course, is aware——

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for clarification? There was no environmental impact statement done in the original study. That is why a large part of the money in our suggestion for the study would go for an environmental impact study, because if the United States were involved in any guarantees we could obviously not do anything without having an EPA statement made. That is the purpose of that.

Mr. DOLE. All right.

The Senator from Kansas, as pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Alaska, is aware, we are all aware, of the sea level canal study commissioned by Congress in 1964.

The Commission's study focused, as I understand, on five feasible sites. Three were within Panama, one ran through Nicaragua and Costa Rica, and one lay within Colombia. The final report, as properly noted by the Senator from Alaska, recommended site No. 10 within Panama as being cheaper and easier to build. But the Commission's recommendation was conditional in nature, and its report clearly stated that route 10 was "subject to the priority of more important national requirements at the time" construction would be contemplated. It specifically recommended that the ultimate decision should also "take into account economic, political and military factors."

Now, the Senator from Kansas does not quarrel with those findings that, based on the study of the new sea level route through Panama, it might be less expensive and less difficult than alternate routes. But it is suggested that other factors ought to be considered: economic, political, and military, and this could make, of course, alternate routes more attractive in the future. I am pleased that the distinguished Senator from Vermont is on the floor because while he was propounding questions, as I understand the provision, it prohibits us from talking to any other country about a new canal. But the Soviet Union or Cuba or anyone else, Saudi Arabia, could negotiate with anyone else to build a competitive enterprise right now.

I would also suggest——

Mr. LEAHY. In Panama?

Mr. DOLE. Anywhere.

Mr. LEAHY. In Panama?

Mr. DOLE. Any other country.

Mr. LEAHY. No, no. I want to be sure I fully understand the distinguished Senator from Kansas. Is he saying they would have the right to negotiate to build one in Panama?

Mr. DOLE. I think so. All we have is a priority. We do not have, again quoting Torrijos, "an exclusive right." The United States is only given the "first option."

Mr. LEAHY. My understanding is that we have a monopoly in the 1903 treaty, and certainly, as I read it, the treaty up for ratification.

Mr. DOLE. We are talking about adopting this treaty which abolishes that monopoly.

Mr. LEAHY. Looking at this treaty, I see it as a complete monopoly. It is betwixt the two of us.

Mr. DOLE. If it is not a complete monopoly, would the Senator support an amendment to strike it out? You would be back to 1903.

Mr. LEAHY. Then if we ratify the rest of the treaty, as I expect we would, are we not then in a situation where Panama can go and negotiate with anybody they want? Quite frankly, while I wonder whether Panama would go along with this section in the proposed treaty, I rather like the fact that if all the major engineering studies say that Panama is the only economically feasible place to build a sea level canal, I rather like the idea that if one is going to build it, it is going to be with the agreement of both Panama and the United States——

Mr. DOLE. Right.

Mr. LEAHY (continuing). Knowing that if anybody is going to build one, Panama is going to have to agree, No. 1; I mean, no matter who else can be involved in the picture, Panama has to agree, No. 1, to build it, and no one would have a chance that someone could walk in and steal the canal, as many feel was done back in 1903.

Mr. DOLE. We do not have to steal it; we are going to give it to them.

Mr. LEAHY. It is called a quid pro quo 75 years later.

Mr. DOLE. If the Senator will yield, I might give him some time, if I have time remaining. I want to make a couple of points.

Mr. LEAHY. If I could just take 10 seconds more to say it——

Mr. DOLE. Right.

Mr. LEAHY (continuing). I just see it as blocking Panama from dealing with anybody else in making a sea level canal, and I rather like that.

Mr. DOLE. Well, I hope I understand it, but let me say——

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, could I propound a question to the Senator on my time? It applies to what the Senator just said.

Mr. DOLE. Let me make three points, and then I will yield; and if I am wrong, the Senator from Alaska can correct me.

As I understand, it is a fact that Panama can allow any other country to build a sea level canal through Panama, including the Soviet Union, so long as they simply notify us first and give us "a first option."

If there is something there the Senator from Kansas has missed, if there is some monopoly power, I hope I will be corrected. I am just going by General Torrijos' interpretation. If we cannot agree on what this means, we have another misunderstanding; we have another DeConcini misunderstanding coming down the pike, or should I say, down the canal.

Second, as I understand, Panama would be entirely within her rights to refuse to allow us to construct a new sea level canal through her territory, even if we felt it absolutely necessary for our defense and our economic interests.

Maybe that is all right. Maybe I agree with the Senator from Vermont there. But the problem is, we cannot go anywhere else if they turn us down.

Finally, I think it is a fact that while we are prohibited from negotiating with any other country about a new canal, the Soviet Union can negotiate with anyone else to build a competitive enterprise.

It seems to me we ought to understand what we are about to do here. As the Senator from Kansas pointed out, I do not know why this provision is in here at all. I can understand that we should not have a right just to go down and say, "We're going to build a canal in Panama" and then build it, if we are talking about intervention in sovereign rights. But I cannot understand why we would make some agreement where we get only a first option, and we preclude ourselves from the right to even negotiate with anyone else.

I would agree that, based on the study referred to by the distinguished Senator from Alaska, the 1964 study, as of now the best route seems to be through Panama. But let us just look at some of the possible scenarios that could occur which would make the Panamanian route less desirable.

First of all, they could flatly refuse our proposal to build a new sea level canal, for reasons ranging from environmental to popular animosity—and I think there may be some of that.

Panama itself could come under the control of a new regime, making us less inclined to risk such a venture.

We could have a natural disaster, an earth slide closing the present canal, thereby necessitating a new canal, maybe even a new site.

Other nations, such as Colombia or Nicaragua, could propose a cost-sharing arrangement that would make our national commitment even less than what was referred to in the study as route No. 10.

And there is always a chance—you know, we live in an era of new technology on a day-to-day basis—that we will have some new technology that will make it easier and less costly to use other routes. In fact, in the Atlantic-Pacific Interoceanic Canal Commission's final report, it is said:

A sea-level canal excavated partially by nuclear methods on Route 25 in Colombia might someday be politically acceptable if proved technically feasible.

So, the point the Senator from Kansas wants to make is that there are a number of reasons why the recommended route through Panama might not be the best route, when it comes time to construct.

What is going to happen after the year 2000? I think it is more likely that we might build a canal after the year 2000 than between now and then.

I do not quarrel with any of the figures cited by the Senator from Alaska as far as tonnage is concerned. He is an expert in the field, far more than the Senator from Kansas, and I can understand his desire to look ahead. I commend it. I think he said that for 57 percent of the shipping on a tonnage basis, the canal is obsolete now.

The point I do not understand is how this provision solves or even addresses that very real, sticky problem the Senator from Alaska has pointed out, not just because of his interest in Alaskan oil, but because of his interest in the future, the future of this country and the interests of this country and other countries as far as traffic is concerned.

I do not really understand what happens if we knock this out. I assume we can negotiate with Panama, or we can negotiate with Colombia, or we can negotiate with Nicaragua, instead of being bound not to negotiate with those countries?

Mr. GRAVEL. Well, on my time, if we can engage in a colloquy. I think you are using more time than I am, and I would like to share it with you. I detect a note of reasonableness, and I might ask if I could hold my colleague's attention, because I have a slight hope that I might be able to persuade him in this regard.

Really, all we are doing in this section of the treaty is setting up a framework for our future course of action. We set up a framework to go forward with the study. After the study is in, then obviously we will have to sit down and make arrangements with the Panamanians, and in my opinion those would be commercial arrangements. I do not think we can say just what those arrangements will be before we have the facts of the study.

There is nothing given away on our side, or on the Panamanians' side, in point of fact. On our side I think it is very simple to see that we have already spent $22 million, and have picked one site, which is Panama.

On the Panamanians' side what are they giving up? They are giving up nothing, either, because, they cannot build—this is a judgment on my part—they cannot build a sea-level canal without us.

We are the biggest users. I think my colleague was out of the room when I gave this figure. If I give him the figure again, I do not think he will use the Soviet Union again as an example.

Mr. DOLE. Actually, I think the Senator from Vermont used it.

Mr. GRAVEL. The Soviet Union presently uses the canal 0.2 percent. The United States uses it 15.8 percent. These are 1969 figures, and the situation today is comparable.

So why on earth would the Soviet Union want to take $10 billion or more and help the Panamanians build a sea-level canal, when the economic viability of that is going to be in our use, the United States use?

To be extreme in this argument, if we were assured that the tolls would be fair, I would encourage the Soviet Union to go do it. Let us use their capital rather than our capital to go build a sea-level canal. Because all we are interested in is that when the canal is finished, everybody can use it at a fair toll. That is all we care about. If the Soviet Union wants to put up its money to furnish a more efficient maritime fleet for ourselves and the rest of the world, bless the Soviet Union; let them do it.

I do not see anything wrong with that. And particularly if we have the interest we have now, then what we will do is have the responsibility to keep it open for them—meaning keep it open for our third of the use. If the Soviet Union wants to use its rubles to invest in the Western world, to make our Western world more efficient, when they only use it 0.2 percent, let them have at it.

I do not think that logic sells. And the figures for the Arab world are considerably less. The only reason why the Arab world would invest in it is that it is a good investment. Their interest is very simple: They would be making a good return on their money.

I think they would invest in it. I would think that when we get around, after the study is done, to building a sea-level canal, that probably the Arab world would put up as much money as the United States for the financing of the canal, because it is the best real estate investment they could find in the whole wide world. If the economics are there, it is the best investment possible. They are not going to get nationalized by anybody, and they will get a fair rate of return. They would want to do that. I think the United States of America, as policy, would encourage the Arabs to make that kind of investment so that we do not rob our own capital markets, which are going to be in desperate shape, because of the balance of payments which will exist as a result of our purchases of oil from the Arab world.

So when raising these specters of, "Well, the Arabs are going to build and negotiate with the Panamanians," or "the Soviets will negotiate with the Panamanians," these are meaningless specters. They do not mean anything. For somebody to dig the canal, whether it is the Panamanians or anybody else, the canal must be economically viable. People do not make uneconomic decisions if they know differently.

The other suggestion is the Panamanians will turn us down cold. I do not know why we would make the inference that the Panamanians are less enlightened than we are. We Americans pride ourselves on our ability that if we see a dollar we will pick it up. If we see an opportunity to make some money, we are not going to sit in the shade. We are going to step out there smartly and get a little of that money.

The Panamanians are just like us. They have a piece of real estate. If we can show them with an economic study that the present canal "we are going to be giving them back" is obsolete and worthless, and what they ought to do is build a new canal, that we will help them finance it and they will make a lot of money off of it, why would they turn down something like that?

We even make deals with our enemies, if we are going to make money off of it. You do not have to love somebody to make money with them. The Panamanians do not have to love us. We may have used up our inventory of good will in Panama in these unfortunate debates. If we have used up that good will, do not worry, it will not make any difference. When the Panamanian people see they can make some money off a sea-level canal, it will not make any difference whether they like us or not. What will be important is can they utilize their geographic location to their economic benefit? That is the issue in question.

That is why I started out by saying that the question with this amendment deals with our enlightened self-interest. So if we take it out, what are we taking out? We are taking out the fact that there is recognition of a sea-level canal possibility. We are taking out the realistic fact that we have to deal with the Panamanians on that subject and that they have to deal with us. Those are the facts that this amendment wants to remove and make out like there is nothing there.

It is all there, and all this section of the treaty does is spell out what is obvious to the world. It is a frame, as I stated, within which we will now move forward with the study. That study will indicate what we should do as separate nations.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas does not quarrel with the 1970 study. I do not think my amendment would affect the study. We do commit ourselves to a new study, jointly, on the feasibility of sea level canal in the Republic of Panama, and in the event they determine such a waterway is necessary, they shall negotiate terms agreeable to both parties for its construction.

The point the Senator from Kansas is making is, before we have the study, that we ought to make some arrangement for what happens after we have had the study. I think the Senator from Alaska, who says we may need a new sea level canal before the year 2000, argues against himself, because if Panama turns us down, we are shut out. We cannot go anywhere else. We do not have any leverage. We cannot talk to Colombian leaders or Nicaraguan leaders, because this contains the veto by Panama. We agree not to do that.

All we have is an option. That option, as I understand it—I hope I understand it correctly—is that we cannot negotiate with any other country than Panama for a canal site unless we are authorized to do so by Panama. On the other hand, the Panamanian commitment is imprecise and it is subject to different interpretations.

As far as the Russians are concerned, the Soviet Union sent 217 ships through the canal in 1976; Cuba sent 48 ships through the canal in 1976. I have not noted any word that the Russians are backing away from involvement. It might be that, judging from their maneuvers in recent weeks and months, and judging from rumors about Cuba and submarine bases and all that, they may want to expand their influence in this hemisphere. They may have more of a design on the canal or on a new canal. They may want to compete with America or with Panama. I do not know that they are any respector of the rights of Panama, the United States, or any other country.

I do not want to quarrel with the desire of the Senator from Alaska to protect the United States, because I share that, but it seems to me that we do just the opposite unless we strike out this particular portion of article XII.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. As the Senator knows, I have taken the position that we should not rewrite the treaties here on the Senate floor, but I do want to say that I think the Senator's amendment goes to one of the most objectionable features in this treaty, one that was thrown in at the last minute, as I understand it, by the negotiators for the United States.

There have been a number of studies. In my minority views, which I would like to refer to, I would like to call attention to some studies that are not inconsistent with the view taken by the Senator from Kansas.

For example, a study at the Georgetown University Center for Strategic Studies in 1967, focusing on canal options, reached this conclusion: "Though the Republic of Panama seems technically"——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is sorry to interrupt but must advise that all time of the Senator from Kansas has expired. The Chair understands that the Senator from Alaska yields 2 minutes to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Chair.

To be the best place for a future canal facility, the United States should not abandon the right to approach other countries for possible canal locations in the event that future political conditions exclude the project from Panama.

In 1967, the Council on Foreign Relations in a study authored by Immanuel J. Klette, surveyed various canal options and concluded the preferable route for a new canal would be the Nicaragua-Costa Rica route. He observed:

> Although the cost of construction bears on the final choices, it should not be the prime factor in making decisions on a new canal. A waterway which is less expensive in dollars may be the most expensive in political consequences.

It seems to me that this provision, in and of itself, is grounds for not approving this treaty and sending it back for renegotiation.

There are other reasons to do that. It seems to me, as I have gone around in my State and talked about these treaties, I find that my constituents are shocked when I read out of the canal treaty from article XII this language:

> During the duration of this treaty, the United States of America shall not negotiate with third States for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route (other than in Panama) in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two parties may otherwise agree.

I find that my constituents are shocked that such language is in there and that we have agreed to that. To me it is certainly one of the most objectionable parts of this canal treaty. I think, of course, these treaties should be sent back for renegotiation.

Mr. GRAVEL. I might say to my colleague from Michigan that I have not reviewed that study. But the taxpayers of Michigan paid $22 million along with the rest of the American taxpayers for a study that did choose a route in Panama. Maybe there is somebody there who knows more than what was decided by this commission.

I would like to read this language from the treaty to the American people, to anybody who is listening, and let them be the judge as to how fair or unfair this treaty language is. It does no more for Panama than it does for us, and no less for us than it does for Panama.

The first paragraph deals with the study:

> Consequently, during the duration of this treaty both parties commit themselves to study jointly the feasibility of a sea-level canal in the Republic of Panama, and in the event they determine that such a waterway is necessary, they shall negotiate terms, agreeable to both Parties, for its construction

As the Senator from Vermont pointed out earlier, the one who is going to be the final deciding factor is going to be Panama. Right now, we have in the treaty that we are both going to decide it mutually.

Is that such a loss? Are your people still so shocked? If they think it is legitimate to go build elsewhere, fine, but there is no evidence that it would be economically feasible to build elsewhere.

Then, what this amendment does, the Dole amendment—here is the language that it wants to strike out. In section 2, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree on the following. Here is this terrible agreement that my colleague would like to cut out. This is the Panamanian side of the quid pro quo:

> (a) No new interoceanic canal shall be constructed in the territory of the Republic of Panama during the duration of this Treaty, or as the two Parties may otherwise agree;

The two parties agree. That is the quid pro quo that binds the Panamanians. I do not see any loopholes there.

Here is the quid pro that binds the United States:

> (b) During the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall not negotiate with third States for the right to construct an interoceanic canal on any other route in the Western Hemisphere, except as the two Parties may otherwise agree.

Now, if treating the Panamanians as equals is offensive, then this language is offensive. That is the only charge you can make of this language, that it does not give us a big edge. It does not give us the hammer that we have had for the last 70 years. If that is what is offensive, then it is offensive.

I submit that anybody that can understand the English language can appreciate that this is fair to the Panamanians and it is fair to the Americans. That is really all a treaty should be, fair. That is all this is.

Now, moving to the other points that are made, and I have been over this ground, but I shall go over it again, hopefully to try to win a few votes—just as an aside to my good colleague, the best time to make an impassioned speech is when you do have enough votes, because then it does not take any persuasion to get them.

I only say that on our side, we have already spent the money looking at the various sites. I can appreciate that there may be, at some time, military considerations; there may be, at a point in time, a situation where maybe they are right. Maybe the Panamanians would be so illogical that they would not want to build a sea-level canal. When would that be? I am having trouble right now getting enthusiasm for the canal and I hope you are all going to join me in voting for the study. If we got the study done, in 3 years, we would know whether we need a canal or not.

My colleague started out by saying, we are not going to need a sea-level canal. Just offhandedly, he said we do not need it.

Again, in your closing remarks, you stated, well, if we ever do, it is going to be after the year 2000. I am the only one around who thinks we can use it by 1985. In fact, I think we could use it today. We would be saving $1 a barrel on U.S. oil found in Alaska and shipped to Houston. That is what we would be saving if that canal were in existence today.

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. GRAVEL. I yield.

Mr. DOLE. You argue against your own position, because you cannot build it anywhere but Panama until after the year 2000. If the study the Senator from Michigan pointed out is accurate, in effect, you are shooting down a theory or proposal which has some merit, which I might support.

Mr. GRAVEL. I am not shooting down any proposal that has any merit. I do not know about the Senator from Michigan. Maybe he will give us the name of the study again that said it should go where? Nicaragua?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That was a study conducted for the Council on Foreign Relations. The reference is on page 191 of the committee report.

Mr. GRAVEL. What is the study, though?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Senator from Alaska keeps saying that the most economically feasible place to build a new canal is in Panama. No one is arguing with him about that. I will concede that it is cheaper to build it in Panama than anywhere else. The question is whether that is the only factor or consideration that we should take into account. I very loudly and very emphatically say, no. It may be important to us to spend an extra $1 billion to build it somewhere else.

I can tell you, it will not cost us nearly as much as it is costing us to build this subway under the city of Washington.

Mr. GRAVEL. If we get to that impasse under this agreement, my colleague says that if the Panamanians turn this down, they can go negotiate with somebody else. They cannot. The language is very clear that under this treaty, if there is no canal in Panama for our use, there is no canal in Panama for the Panamanians' use. That language is very clear, so references to the contrary just do not hold water.

Mr. DOLE. That is not what Omar says.

Mr. GRAVEL. I do not want to use the body's time to reread the English language, which is quite clear. The quid pro quos bind both of us to a mutual agreement.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DOLE. I hope we can have an up-or-down vote on this.

Mr. CHURCH. I think it would be appropriate to move to table the amendment, when time has expired. I merely want to point out that, although I am in full agreement with the distinguished Senator from Alaska, the provision this amendment would strike is at least as favorable for the United States as for Panama. Therefore, it is not restrictive. Still, if a majority of the Senate entertains a different view, then the way for the matter to be handled is not by amendment to the treaty itself, which would force a change in the text of the treaty and might well require a second plebiscite in Panama, but rather by an amendment to the articles of ratification.

I am certain the Senate will have a second opportunity to consider this matter in the form of an amendment to the articles of ratification. Then it can take such action as the majority deems fit.

Quite apart from the merits of the argument, pro or con, the wrong way to act would be to force a change in the text of the treaty. On that ground alone, the Senate should vote to table this amendment.

Mr. President, if the Senator will oblige me further, I inquire of the Chair how much time remains to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has 5 minutes remaining. The Senator from Kansas has exhausted his time.

Mr. CHURCH. Very well. I am happy to accede to the request of the distinguished Senator from Alaska. He has 2 or 3 more minutes. Then, when he has completed his remarks, I shall move to table the amendment.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, I only conclude by the statement that, if we could go back to 1970, when the interoceanic canal study was completed, and if the canal at that time had come into being, the sea level canal, on the average projections that they made as to what it would take in the way of revenue to amortize 60-year bonds at 6 percent interest, the revenue that subsequently we would have earned in the last 7 years would have paid handsomely to retire those bonds. In fact, there would have been almost a 100-percent profit above the cost of construction.

I can only say that, using that, I am not talking about the new tremendous discoveries of oil in Alaska or all these other facets. I am only saying that the present canal is moving toward obsolescence at a rate so fast that the new one coming into being would have been viable. That is the case that I make: That we are going to need a sea level canal. It can only come about with the good will of the people of Panama. We can best acquire that good will with the passage of these treaties unfettered by what the Senate might want to add.

I hope that my colleagues will recognize the enlightened self-interest of the United States of America and vote to table the amendment of my colleague from Kansas.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the Senator from Alaska have a minute left?

Mr. GRAVEL. How much time do I have left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. GRAVEL. I am happy to yield a minute.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Senator from Alaska.

I guess one of the questions here is whether we have a fair agreement, as the Senator from Alaska describes it. On the one hand, we agree that we will not even negotiate with any other countries in the Western Hemisphere for the possible construction of a second canal.

And what does Panama give us? It gives us the promise that Panama will negotiate with us about the possible construction of a sea level canal within Panama.

On October 23 in a radio interview, General Torrijos was asked the question:

(Question). General, I would like to know if you think the Government will begin work, pardon me, studies regarding a possible sea-level canal.

(Answer). The production of oil in Alaska and the existence of large tankers practically forces one to think about the construction of a sea-level canal. Some very complete studies, which cost many millions, have already been done. Now it is necessary to update or nationalize them; that is, adapt them to the national interests. The new treaty obliges us to continue studying with the United States the possibility of constructing a sea-level canal, but it does not obligate us to build it jointly with the United States. They have the first option. And if we cannot reach an agreement with them, we can seek the technology of any other country here in our world.

Well, that is not stating anything that anyone could not, of course, derive from the treaty itself as it is proposed, but those were the words of General Torrijos.

Obviously, they stand ready, possibly, to build a canal in Panama with anybody else they see fit if we do not meet their terms.

At the same time, we have tied our hands between now and the year 2000 to go to any other country and build such a canal.

Mr. GRAVEL. The truth of the matter is that the quote of General Torrijos is merely interpretive of the specifics of the treaty, and ties their hands as well as our hands. We cannot do anything without it. They cannot do anything without it.

But there is no question we could both agree, if we do not want to get involved in the sea level canal, we can let them do it, because we are going to be the beneficiaries of it.

That is what that quote is from General Torrijos. I think we do him an injustice to infer more than that.

It says that under the treaty, very clearly, with respect to Panama, that this provision holds unless the two parties may otherwise agree. With respect to the U.S. side of it, it is also except as the two parties may otherwise agree.

So we do not know what we will agree to in 1990, nor does Panama. But if we agree to let them do it, they can get the technology from Japan, Germany, or anywhere else to do it.

Of course, I think we do General Torrijos a great injustice with that quote out of context.

I think what is clear here is what the treaty says, and the treaty says very clearly in the English language that both sides are treated equally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. DOLE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK) are necessarily absent.

On this vote, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS) is paired with the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI). If present and voting, the Senator from South Carolina would vote "yea" and the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BARTLETT), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 40, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 38

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOYNIHAN). The question now recurs on amendment No. 38 offered by the Senator from Utah.

Does the Senator from Idaho wish to be recognized?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CHURCH. Is there any controlled time on the pending amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, there is not.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CHURCH. Is the rule relating to germaneness any longer in effect?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no requirement that this amendment be germane.

Mr. CHURCH. Is there any requirement that debate be directed toward this amendment under the germaneness rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at this hour of the day, 3 hours having expired.

Will the Senator desist for a moment?

The Senate is not in order.

Will Senators desiring to converse retire to the cloakrooms if they have a matter to be negotiated?

The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I wish to take some time this afternoon to address a subject which, I believe, is weighing heavily on the minds of most of us who are well aware of the deep concern which has emerged during the last few days in Panama concerning the action we took on the neutrality treaty on March 16.

In approving that treaty, the Senate adopted 13 amendments, conditions, reservations, and understandings, all of which were intended to clarify and thus to strengthen the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator kindly suspend for a moment?

The Senator from Idaho is making an address of the greatest importance. Will Senators show him the courtesy of listening in silence or retire from the Chamber?

Will the Senate be in order?

The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. These were responsible actions. In the course of hearings of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the debate here on the floor of the Senate, particular aspects of the treaty were pointed out which many of us felt were ambiguous. We felt these ambiguities could lead to confusion and contention between the U.S. and Panama in the future, and that these points therefore had to be clarified if we were to achieve the intended purposes of these treaties —to assure the protection of long-term U.S. interests in the Panama Canal through a new, modern, and mutually acceptable treaty relationship with Panama.

It is highly regrettable, however, that in the course of strengthening the Neutrality Treaty—by removing the ambiguities that we found in it—we appear to have introduced a new ambiguity which is causing grave concerns among the people of Panama. I refer here to the first "Condition" which appears in the Senate's resolution of ratification—the provision popularly known as the "DeConcini Reservation."

Let us analyze for a moment why we did what we did, and why the people of Panama are concerned about it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is correct. The Senate has not shown its customary courtesy to the Senator from Idaho. Will those Senators wishing to converse leave the Chamber so that others may listen as they wish to.

The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. The Neutrality Treaty, as it was signed by President Carter and General Torrijos last September 7, contained a provision which reads as follows:

ARTICLE IV

"The United States of America and the Republic of Panama agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral, notwithstanding the termination of any other treaties entered into by the two Contracting Parties."

During the hearings held by the Committee on Foreign Relations, top administration spokesmen, including the U.S. treaty negotiators and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, all testified that this language gave the United States the right to take necessary action—including military action—to protect and defend the canal, even after the year 2000. During the hearings, this right was at times loosely referred to by Members of the Seunate, the press, and on occasion by administration spokesmen as a right to "intervene." I believe we all recall that at that time Panamanian Government spokesmen were assuring their constituents that the treaty did not give the United States a right of "intervention."

These apparently contradictory statements about the fundamental security aspect of the new treaties gave rise to great concern here in the Senate. The Committee on Foreign Relations made it clear to the administration that it could not in good conscience report out the treaties favorably unless these ambiguities were clarified. At the same time, these apparent contradictions were creating equal concern in Panama, as the opposition groups there pointed out the discrepancies between the statements of the Panamanian Government's spokesmen, and those of the U.S. Government.

I repeat this recent history, Mr. President, to remind everyone that the problem we were facing last fall—which at that time appeared to be an enormous defect in the treaties—turned out to be largely a problem of semantics. There was no real disagreement between the two countries on the fundamental rights of each to act to protect the neutrality of the canal. The disagreement was over the way those rights were expressed. It was a problem over the use of the term "intervention."

Intervention to us may mean taking action for the limited and specific purpose of protecting our legitimate security interests in the Canal. But in Panama, and throughout the rest of this Hemisphere, the word "intervention" conjures up all that was humiliating and distasteful in their relations with the United States fifty years ago. To them it means U.S. Marines occupying Haiti and Nicaragua and running the governments of those countries for decades. It means the Platt Amendment. And it means the repeated interventions of the U.S. in the internal affairs of Panama in the early part of this century. Under the original 1903 Treaty, we periodically sent our forces into their towns and cities—even those hundreds of miles from the Canal—and changed their government if we were unhappy with its politics.

Over forty years ago, we recognized that intervention in the internal affairs of other nations was contrary to our own national interests. In the 1930's, we removed our troops from Haiti and Nicaragua, and repealed the Platt Amendment. And in 1936, we terminated our treaty rights to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama. Since that time, we have strongly promoted international agreements committing all countries to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of their neighbors and to forswear intervention in their internal affairs. The Charter of the United Nations, the Charter of the Organization of American States, and the Inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance—our pact of military alliance with our neighbors in this hemisphere—all contain provisions flatly prohibiting intervention in the internal affairs of other nations.

So the U.S. policy of intervention is long gone. But in the Latin America, the memory lingers on. The principal unifying factor in the foreign policy of the various Latin American nations for the past 40 years has been support for the principle of nonintervention. Having embarked 40 years ago on a new and more mature relationship with the United States, the countries of Latin America are determined to keep it that way. Thus, whatever we may intend by the term, loose talk in the United States about "intervention" raises deeply-felt concern throughout the hemisphere. It was for this reason we found ourselves in such difficulty last fall when we were discussing the security aspects of these treaties in terms of "intervention."

So what did we do about it then? President Carter and General Torrijos got together and issued a statement of understanding which clearly defined the right of the United States under the treaty to act to insure that the canal will remain open, secure and accessible. That portion of their statement reads as follows:

> Under the Treaty Concerning the Permanent Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal (the Neutrality Treaty), Panama and the United States have the responsibility to assure that the Panama Canal will remain open and secure to ships of all nations. The correct interpretation of this principle is that each of the two countries shall, in accordance with their respective constitutional processes, defend the Canal against any threat to the regime of neutrality, and consequently shall have the right to act against any aggression or threat directed against the Canal or against the peaceful transit of vessels through the Canal.

At the same time that they thus clarified what the treaty did mean, however, they also made clear what it did not mean. The statement goes on to say:

> This does not mean, nor shall it be interpreted as a right to intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Panama. Any United States action will be directed at insuring that the Canal will remain open, secure, and accessible, and it shall never be directed against the territorial integrity or political independence of Panama.

With the treaty thus clarified, the people of Panama went on to approve it by a 2 to 1 margin in a national plebiscite. The Senate of the United States voted 85 to 5 in favor of the leadership amendment to incorprate this clarifying statement into the text of the treaty and, like the people of Panama, voted to approve the treaty by a 2 to 1 margin. But in the process, as I indicated earlier, the Senate adopted a further clarification which has given rise to an extremely delicate and emotional situation in Panama. Here is the text we adopted:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of Article V or any other provision of the Treaty, if the Canal is closed, or its operations are interfered with, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall each independently have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes, including the use of military force in Panama, to reopen the Canal or restore the operations of the Canal, as the case may be.

Now what is the problem with this language? It is purpose was to further clarify what the two countries had agreed to in the security provisions of the treaty. As General Torrijos put it in his letter of March 15 to President Carter, the treaty establishes "the unilateral capability of each one of our countries to protect the regime of neutrality against threats, attacks, or a closing of the canal." The Senator who introduced the provision in question indicated a very similar understanding. He stated:

> If America is to have any rights at all under this treaty, it must have the right to act independently to protect the canal and to keep it open.

So why the problem? There seems to be no disagreement as to our rights to take action to assure the openness and neutrality of the canal. No. The problem is not one of substance. Rather, it revolves around the emotion-charged matter of intervention in internal affairs.

As I noted earlier, the leadership amendment not only states what our rights are—it states what they are not. It makes perfectly clear that the United States has no interest in or intention of intervening in the internal affairs of Panama. But the provision we adopted on the 16th of March makes no such disclaimer; indeed, because it begins "notwithstanding * * * any other provision of the treaty * * *" it is being interpreted by the people of Panama as a nullification of the clear statement concerning nonintervention and respect for Panama's territorial integrity and political independence which the Senate voted 85 to 5 to adopt in the leadership amendment.

Now this was clearly not the intent of the Senate. The Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), who introduced the provision, stated:

> I believe I speak for all Senators in stating that it is not our expectation that this change gives to the United States the right to interfere in the sovereign affairs of Panama. The United States will continue to respect the territorial integrity of that Nation.

So I think there can be little question about the true intention of the sponsor of the reservation. Other Senators who spoke in favor of the provision similarly indicated that its purpose was to clarify —not to nullify—the other provisions of the treaty.

So the objections being raised in Panama are not objections to what he Senate in fact intended in adopting this language. Rather, they are objections to an interpretation of the provision which the Senate did not have in mind—and in fact disclaimed—in discussing the provision.

Perhaps the people of Panama are overreacting. Perhaps they are interpreting this language out of context. Clearly they are reading an intention into our language that was not actually there.

But perhaps their reaction is not so inexplicable in view of Latin America's historical concern over U.S. intervention in their internal affairs which I outlined earlier. And perhaps it is not so unwarranted in light of repeated statements during this debate which showed little respect for the dignity of this small but proud ally.

In effect, Mr. President, we are facing the same situation we faced last fall. We have stated our right to take legitimate action to protect our interests in the canal; many people of Panama have misinterpreted the language we have used in stating those rights as evidence of an intent to revert to the era of gunboat diplomacy and to humiliate their nation.

What is the solution, Mr. President? Is it, as some have suggested, to prevail on General Torrijos to silence the expressions of concern in Panama so we can pretend they do not exist? Clearly not. It would be not only insulting to the people of Panama, but also a grave miscalculation, to make the assumption that the opponents of the Treaty have so long espoused in this debate—that nothing occurs in Panama unless General Torrijos directs that it occur. Whatever we may think about the Torrijos regime, it is clear in this instance that we are faced not with the political dictates of one man, or of his government. We are faced with the heartfelt concern of all segments of Panama society. The news reports from Panama over the past few days make it clear that this concern is being expressed not just by left-wing student groups, but by professional groups and by all the traditional democratic political parties, both conservative and liberal. The Communist Party of Panama is the only one that has not expressed concern—perhaps it sees some mileage to be gained in letting the problem develop further. Most significantly, the business community of Panama is now calling for rejection of the treaty. These are the people who stand to gain the most from the treaties in economic terms.

Mr. President, this is a serious matter.

As long as the Panamanian people believe that the language the Senate has adopted is intended to humilitate them as a nation, by delegating to the United States the ultimate right to govern their internal affairs, there is nothing we or General Torrijos can do to get them to accept these treaties. It would be contrary to our entire concept of human rights and, even more important, contrary to the national interests of the United States these treaties are designed to advance, to suggest that General Torrijos somehow stifle the dissent that has developed in Panama and go ahead as if nothing had happened.

What then is the solution? As I suggested earlier, Mr. President, we are in much the same situation as we were in last fall. Faced then with apparent differences in interpretation, we said what we did mean and what we did not mean. I would submit that we follow the same approach at this time.

Let us make it unmistakably clear that we will not back away from or dilute in any fashion the essential and legitimate rights to protect the neutrality of the canal which we have so carefully defined in the treaty and in the action taken by the Senate. But let us also clearly recognize that the people of Panama are not suddenly opposing the rights to take legitimate action which they have freely granted us in the treaty. Rather, they are opposing an illegitimate interpretation of those rights. The problem, I repeat, is not what we did in clarifying our rights, but in what the Panamanian people are afraid we did.

Let us find an appropriate way to reassure the people of Panama that our intention was not to nullify the specific pledge of nonintervention in the internal affairs of Panama, which 85 Senators voted to incorporate into the treaty.

Let us find a way to reaffirm the specific commitment to respect Panama's territorial integrity and political independence which we similarly voted to incorporate in the treaty.

Let us find a way to tell all the nations of this hemisphere that we have not in one afternoon nullified the last 40 years in the history of United States-Latin American relations.

Let us make it clear to the world that we are not seeking for ourselves the kind of rights the Soviets claimed in Czechoslovakia in 1968.

Mr. President, these treaties are too important to our national interests to allow them to fail over what amounts to a mere misunderstanding. These treaties were painstakingly negotiated over a 14-year period. The Senate has devoted an unprecedented amount of time to debating and perfecting them. They are good treaties—good for us and good for Panama. If we were to allow these treaties to fail, we would never be able to achieve better ones.

We have a duty to ourselves and to the American people to be sure that these treaties do not fail on account of misinterpretations of our actions.

We can tell ourselves that the fears being expressed by the people of Panama are unwarranted. We can say to ourselves that it is their fault if they have misinterpreted our intentions and our actions. We can criticize the Torrijos government for not doing a better job of explaining to the Panamanian people the true meaning of what we have done.

But in the end, we must recognize that, however unfounded, the concerns of the people of Panama are very real and serious concerns to them. We will not have done our duty if we do not address those concerns by clearly and precisely expressing our own intentions to the people of Panama.

Mr. President, I am not proposing that we undo what we have done, or water it down, or dilute it in any way. Fortunately, there is no reason to do so. What we can do and must do is reassure the people of Panama as to what we have not done. We must state categorically that we neither sought nor obtained a right to intervene in their internal affairs, nor do we have any intention of doing so. In this way we can show not only that we insist on preserving the legitimate rights of the United States to protect the canal, but also that we are prepared to respect the legitimate rights of the Panamanian people to independence and national dignity.

Mr. President, I trust that the Senate will find an appropriate way to communicate its true intentions to the people of Panama and to thus promptly resolve the misunderstanding that has arisen. In the meantime, we must proceed to complete our historic task of debating the Panama Canal Treaty. We have come a long way, and must not allow ourselves to be distracted at the last moment by a temporary misunderstanding—a misunderstanding which will, in the end, rate at best only a footnote in the history of this great undertaking in which we have all invested so much.

(Mrs. HUMPHREY assumed the chair.)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Madam President, I rise to congratulate the Senator from Idaho for what in history may prove to be the critical address in this long, crucial debate. I speak, Madam President, as one of the handful of Senators who are supporters of the treaties, who nonetheless voted against the DeConcini amendment. I did out of a sense that we were not showing that sensibility of concern and feeling on the part of the people of Panama that is owing a neighboring nation, a nation with which we have had the closest relations for the longest time.

I can perhaps say personally that in the aftermath I ceased to participate as actively as I had previously done in this debate. On the first occasion I did speak, I spoke too strongly. I felt too strongly. I mentioned that only to suggest that this is a matter capable of arousing very strong feeling.

I think the Senator from Idaho has addressed the large point which has to be kept first in mind, which is what truly is the disposition of our Nation toward that nation? This is properly to be looked for in the text of documents, but much more powerfully it will be seen in the acts of history, in the trends of events sustained over what is now more than two generations in our political life, since the time of Franklin Roosevelt.

The United States has been judged, as, for that matter, have other countries in Latin America, when intervention in the affairs of others was a repeated event, not extraordinary, in Haiti, in Nicaragua, and it did occur in Panama. This was an age and era when such interventions, when such actions, were scarcely unknown in the world and not really very much thought to be illiberal, even.

The Senator may have had the occasion to visit Canada Square in Montreal. There is a great monument there to a regiment of Canadians who had gone off to fight in the Boer War. The monument is simply entitled, in large bronze letters, "Imperium et libertis," Empire and Liberty. These were not to be entirely compatible views. We have changed, and the people no longer will accept that.

I think the Senator spoke to an important point when he mentioned the rights claimed by the Soviet Union in the case of Czechoslovakia in 1966, which have come to be known as the Khrushchev doctrine, the doctrine of proletarian internationalism, I believe, which gives the Soviet Union, by their judgment, the right, unilaterally, to intervene in other nations' affairs which have some comparable political system.

We have absolutely rejected such things. We have absolutely said no to that for others and for ourselves. This is not our disposition as a people. If we had a disposition that troubles someone such as myself, it would be a growing unwillingness to make those commitments to the responsibilities which inevitably we have as the largest and most powerful of the free nations in the world.

That is the problem which troubles American leaders and American Presidents. Will this Nation any more do what it has to do in Western Europe, in Japan, in other parts of the world? The people of Panama might usefully consider that this is one of our major concerns. It is not that we are going around the world looking for adventure, but that we are too much of a strength for the world.

I would think that they might consider that the unique geographical position they hold in the world offers unique benefits but also unique burdens, not so much that we have because of our size, for the consequences of Japan and West Germany alike, but because of their location and where one of the largest nations in the Western Hemisphere built the canal and wants to continue to help operate it up to the year 2000.

I will not say the Senator has resolved all of my concerns, but he has spoken the truth about the disposition of this Nation and the intention of this Senate. It is not to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama at all, not one bit. That truth one might hope would be large in the minds, thoughts, and the considerations of the citizens of Panama as they now judge our further progress on this treaty.

Madam President, I rose merely to speak as someone who supports these treaties, who did not support the amendment in question, to say to those who might be listening in this Nation or in Panama, to the Members of the Senate listening in, and to those who will read this in the RECORD, the Senator from Idaho spoke the truth. This country has no intention to intervene in the affairs of Panama whatever. The Senate in adopting this reservation intended no such intervention. In no way did that condition in our minds in any way affect the basic understandings incorporated in the treaty by our negotiators and expanded in that direct documents exchange between the President of the United States and General Torrijos as the head of government in Panama.

Madam President, I have said my point, which is to congratulate the Senator, and to say that he certainly speaks for this Senator, who was in opposition in that particular matter. His statement accords completely with my understanding, and I think that would be the case for all the Senators.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am happy to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I want to say that in the course of our consideration of these treaties, I insisted time after time that we abolish the word "intervene" or "intervention" so far as the handling of these treaties. I still believe that we ought to get out of our minds that we are approving at any time intervention in the internal affairs of Panama or any other country.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. May I say, and I hope the Senator will not think this presumptuous, there have been few men in the history of this Republic who have so much contributed to getting intervention not only out of our minds but getting it out of our foreign policy as JOHN SPARKMAN of Alabama.

This is not a conviction you have brought recently to the conduct of foreign affairs; it is something you have stood for in one of the most distinguished careers in this body involving foreign affairs for—I dare not say how many years; more than a generation, sir.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. CHURCH. I subscribe to the remarks made by the Senator from New York. We all owe a debt of gratitude to the distinguished Senator from Alabama and I compliment him on his fine and distinguished career.

Also, I concur with what our distinguished chairman has said. "Intervention" is a word we should avoid because of its history and because of the way it is construed in Latin America. For 40 years now, from the time that Franklin Roosevelt first enunciated the Good Neighbor policy, we have incorporated the principle of nonintervention as a cornerstone of our policy toward our Latin neighbors.

(Mr. MOYNIHAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. CHURCH. We have expressly covenanted not to intervene in the internal affairs of Latin American countries in all of our principal treaties with the nations of this hemisphere, as well as in the Charter of the United Nations. Let no one labor under the misunderstanding that by adopting any amendment to the Neutrality Treaty, we abandon the cornerstone of American policy toward the Western Hemisphere.

It would indeed be a tragedy if the DeConcini amendment were interpreted differently than the author himself interpreted it in the course of the Senate debate.

Now I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague for yielding. I should like, one, to state very clearly that, as concerns FRANK CHURCH, the Senator from Idaho, I say he speaks the truth and I say I associate myself with his remarks. But I must differ with my colleague in this regard: He is very clear in his view of intervention, but I pray that we will always have leaders in this country that will be equally clear with respect to his view on intervention. That may not always be the case. We may not always have leaders as mature as my colleague from Idaho. For that reason, I, unfortunately, must differ and say that what we have done is most unfortunate.

We may well have to do something to correct the situation. I do not quite yet know what that would be, but I must add some information to this dialog which I think is at variance with his interpretation. I think my colleague is honest and his interpretation is well meaning, becuse that is him; that is FRANK CHURCH. But I think the realities that exist in the world today are somewhat different.

As I read the DeConcini amendment, I feel bad that we did not put up a greater fight at that time. I think we were all concerned with just winning. But I think the issue now is a little greater than that. I think I would rather have seen the treaty go down to defeat than have something that now I think casts a serious, serious shadow on that Neutrality Treaty.

I would say that, as my colleague quoted—and again, let me just say that I do not think that it will satisfy the people of Panama to have the single word of FRANK CHURCH. That is not going to do it. The word of FRANK CHURCH and MIKE GRAVEL and anybody else will not do it. What is really going to do it is what is in the treaty, because when we are long gone, that is what is going to be interpreted. I think we have created a tremendous ambiguity in that treaty.

Article V was very clear that the only military force would be Panamanians. Then, when we came on with the leadership amendment, that was very clear about intervention. And that had 85 votes, as the Senator pointed out. But the DeConcini amendment had 75. They both had a very large number of votes. I think we can only look at what the DeConcini amendment says, and that is very clear that we can intervene independently if we choose.

We then must go to what Senator DECONCINI said on the floor in the debate prior to his amendment, and I think that is clear. I shall quote two passages. That is on page S3817:

> If the Panama Canal is closed, the United States has the right to enter Panama—

To enter Panama; not the canal—

> using whatever means are necessary to reopen the canal.

He goes on to say:

> There are no conditions, no exceptions, no limitations on this right.

Then, a little further on he states:

> I have been equally bothered by the possibility that internal Panamanian activities might also be a threat to the waterway, should we give it up. Labor unrest and strikes; the actions of an unfriendly government; political riots or upheavals.

This would be comparable to saying in this country that if we had an airline strike that crippled New York City and that inconvenienced foreigners, if they had the muscle to back it up and we had a treaty, we ceded those powers.

Mr. CHURCH. May I respond to the Senator?

Mr. GRAVEL. If I may just briefly complete it, I shall be happy to hear a response.

All I can say is that we may be well-meaning, but this is what is in the treaty. Twenty years from now, something very tragic could happen and we might have an interventionist leadership and we would rule the day that this confusion was added.

I thought it was very clear before we added the DeConcini amendment. That is what made the confusion.

Mr. CHURCH. Let me say that the reason I made this speech was to establish some legislative history with respect to the intention of the Senate in enacting the so-called DeConcini amendment. I think it would be wrong if the legislative history was based solely on the debate that day, some portions of which have now been read again into the RECORD by the Senator from Alaska.

It is true that Senator DECONCINI made some remarks that extended beyond security considerations for the canal itself. It is also true that in the course of his presentation he said:

> I believe I speak for all Senators in stating that it is not our expectation that this change gives to the United States the right to interfere in the sovereign affairs of Panama. The United States will continue to respect the territorial integrity of that Nation.

Now, my address today is meant to be a construction of what the Senate as a whole did in adopting this particular reservation. I am sure that the Senator from Alaska would agree with me that there is nothing in the record, either that day or any other day in this debate, to suggest that it was the purpose of the Senate to remove what, for 40 years, has been the cornerstone of our relations with all our Latin neighbors: Namely to disclaim our adherence to the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of Latin countries.

I would concede to him that, in view of the adoption of the DeConcini amendment, it would be wise for the Senate to take some action to dispel any doubt on that score. I believe that it will be possible for the Senate to do so while fully preserving our rights to defend the canal and protect it against any threat to the regime of neutrality—principles to which both nations are pledged. I am not yet prepared to say exactly what form that action should take.

But the Senator and I do not really have any disagreement, and I think it would be a disservice for us to suggest to the radio audience that there is serious division between us.

I made this speech to attempt to clarify the intention of the Senate as a whole and to contribute to the legislative history connected with the DeConcini amendment.

In the course of the speech, I stressed the need for the Senate to consider some appropriate action to clarify that, in passing the DeConcini amendment, it was not our intention to claim a right to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama, or in any way to infringe upon the independence of that country.

Mr. GRAVEL. I might only state to my colleagues that there is no disagreement between us on the substance. Where I think I do part company is in attempting to understand how the Panamanians view it and how future leaders may choose to view it.

Mr. CHURCH. It is for this reason I believe some clarifying language is called for and I hope that the Senate will address itself to that in the next few days.

Mr. GRAVEL. If I hear my colleague correctly, that we will have a chance for the Senate to vote on some clarifying language, then he is correct. That is the only way we can undo the damage that has been done, because if we do not have that clarifying language—and my colleague stated at the beginning the words of Senator DECONCINI, that we will continue to respect the sovereignty—earlier, obviously, it was stated we had a pretty bad track record of not respecting that sovereignty.

So from the Panamanian point of view, that is not quite acceptable. I would think it unfair to those people—and I might say we are just talking about our side.

I heard a Senator today express a view of concern that we could not go dig a ditch in Panama. How does a Panamanian citizen listen to that when a Senator of some renown stands up and says, "Boy, I'm surprised we can't go and unilaterally dig the sea-level canal."

I resent the fact they would have a different attitude. So, from their point of view, there is deep concern.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I, too, am fully aware of the sensibilities of the Panamanian people. Often in the course of this debate I have shuddered to think of how they must resent some of the demanding and deprecating things that have been said about them by Senators in this Chamber. But I would hope that they would remember that they are listening to individual Senators expressing individual viewpoints.

The Senate by its vote has overwhelmingly rejected the arguments based upon demeaning appraisals of Panama and the Panamanian people. The Senate as a whole has reflected the viewpoint of the American people as a whole.

We, as a Nation, recognize that the Panamanians have been extraordinarily patient and forebearing in the course of this debate. We, as a people, recognize what staunch and steadfast allies they have been to the United States in our times of critical need, both in the First and Second World Wars.

The great majority of Senators have a profound respect for the people of Panama and understand why they are extremely sensitive to anything that smacks of interventionism.

That is why this afternoon I have tried to place in some perspective the action taken by the Senate when it approved the DeConcini amendment. I would not suppose that many Senators would disagree with me when I say that that amendment was not meant to repeal what has constituted the cornerstone of our foreign policy toward Latin America for the past 40 years, namely, our adherence to the policy and the principle of nonintervention in the internal affairs of Latin governments.

That is the whole purpose of my speech.

I recognize that a problem has been created, particularly in Panama, due to sensitivity over anything that smacks of interventionism. I hope that any doubts on that score can be allayed by some subsequent action of the Senate between now and the time we come to a final vote on this treaty.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I am prepared to yield the floor at this time.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, recent developments in Panama following Senate adoption of the DeConcini reservation have been described by some in the press and by some treaty supporters as "unexpected" and "surprising."

At the risk of saying, "I told you so," I must say that I, for one, have not been surprised.

Indeed, this Senator expressed deep concern on a number of occasions that Panama and the United States were not really in agreement on the alleged right of the United States, unilaterally, to use military force to defend the canal against any threat, domestic or foreign.

As I have repeatedly warned, an effort to rewrite the treaties here on the Senate floor—and then to present the revised treaty on a "take it or leave it" basis to Panama—would create understandable bitterness among the Panamanian people.

This was a principal reason for the position I have taken throughout the debate that the Senate should return the treaties to the President with the advice that negotiations be resumed so that the obvious ambiguities and other problems could be resolved between representatives of the two countries meeting on an equal footing.

As I said in a speech to the Senate on March 6:

> We would be living in a fool's paradise to assume that these contradictory interpretations will simply go away if the treaties are ratified. Indeed, we would be most fortunate if they do not come back to haunt us in a most agonizing way in the years to come . . .
> Obviously, it matters not how many times we declare and repeat that language in the treaty means one thing—if the people of Panama believe and openly insist that it means something else, we really do not have an agreement to ratify.

Let us review what has transpired:

Shortly after the treaties were drafted, some of the ambiguities—particularly with respect to U.S. defense rights—led to conflicting interpretations by Panamanian and American spokesmen.

In an attempt to clarify the situation, President Carter and General Torrijos issued a joint statement of understanding on October 14, 1977.

The Senate and American people were then assured by the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee that under the Neutrality Treaty, the United States would have the right to use military force unilaterally to protect the neutrality of the canal against any threat, domestic or foreign. For example, the report of the Foreign Relations Committee proclaimed that the Neutrality Treaty, as clarified by the Carter-Torrijos statement of October 14, would allow the United States "to introduce its Armed Forces into Panama whenever and however the canal is threatened * * * The United States [would have] the right to act as it deems proper against any threat to the canal, internal or external, domestic or foreign, military or nonmilitary."

However, despite those assertions in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, it was clear to this Senator that Panamanian officials did not so interpret the Neutrality Treaty or the Carter-Torrijos joint statement.

I spoke at some length in the Senate on March 6 and put in the RECORD a wealth of documentation to support the conclusion I had reached that agreement between the two countries had not, in fact, been reached with regard to the defense rights of the United States.

For example, I quoted Foreign Ministry Adviser Luis Bejarano, who told the Panamanian people 3 days after the release of the Carter-Torrijos joint statement:

> In the event of an attack on the Canal by a third power, the Republic of Panama must agree to the participation of the United States in the defense of the Canal. . . . [T]he Republic of Panama has primary responsibility for defending the Canal after 31 December 1999 and, in the event of foreign intervention by a strong nation, the Republic of Panama, after exhausting its tactical defense resources, may agree with the United States to carry out this defense if necessary. [Emphasis supplied.]

Obviously, that spokesman for the Panamanian Government did not interpret understand this treaty as it has been represented by the Foreign Relations Committee report.

My remarks and the accompanying documentation took up nearly 20 pages of the RECORD, but my warnings were widely ignored by the media and brushed aside by the treaty proponents in the Senate.

Indeed, on March 6, after I documented extensively the wide differences of interpretation which continued following the Carter-Torrijos joint statement, Senator CHURCH—I am sorry he is not on the floor at the moment—said this:

A few minutes ago, Mr. President, the able Senator from Michigan once again raised the specter of differing interpretations, as between the United States and Panama, with respect to our right to protect the canal. . . . To some extent, all of this is so much ancient history. Yes, there was a time when the treaty provisions . . . were being interpreted differently by some Panamanians and by some Americans. And yes, I stated flatly that I would not vote to ratify the treaties if these differing interpretations were not clarified by both parties. Such clarification was forthcoming on October 14 in the form of the Carter-Torrijos memorandum of understanding. In view of this clarification, I am forced to ask why the Senator from Michigan does not recognize that the specific purpose was to insure that the United States and Panama would interpret those critical provisions in exactly the same way; to wit, that the United States would have the right to defend the canal against any threat in perpetuity in accordance with its constitutional processes. . . . [T]he incorporation of these critical provisions will serve to guarantee that there are no differing interpretations. . . . If the Senator from Michigan and others persist in suggesting otherwise, they will have to be held responsible for a distortion of the record. [Emphasis supplied]

I suggest, most respectfully, that the events of the past week in Panama have demonstrated quite clearly that it has not been the Senator from Michigan who has been responsible for a "distortion of the record."

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I would like to finish my speech. I would have yielded to the Senator from Idaho, because I mentioned his name. I do not have very much more.

Mr. SARBANES. May I have the date on which the Senator from Idaho made the statement to which the Senator from Michigan referred?

Mr. GRIFFIN. March 6.

On March 16, the Senate adopted the so-called DeConcini reservation to the Neutrality Treaty, which provides that:

If the canal is closed, or its operations are interfered with, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall independently have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional precedents, including the use of military force in Panama, to reopen the canal or restore the operations of the canal, as the case may be.

In other words, Senator DECONCINI merely was seeking to spell out in unambiguous terms some of the assurances given to the Senate by the Carter administration and by the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Obviously, there would have been no Panamanian objection to the DeConcini reservation if Panama had understood the treaty language as the administration and the Foreign Relations Committee report had been contending all along.

For the record, let me say that I voted against the DeConcini reservation—not because I disagreed with the purpose—but because as I have said all along, I do not think the treaty should be rewritten in a substantive way on the Senate floor. I think any major changes should be achieved through renegotiation.

Many of our colleagues. particularly supporters of the treaty, obviously took the view or assumed that the DeConcini language would really not alter the meaning of the treaty. Thus, Senator CHURCH said:

[T]his reservation must be considered, in my view, in part as a restatement in part as an elaboration of the amendment already adopted by the Senate to article IV of the Neutrality Treaty. As such, it is acceptable and I hope that the Senate will adopt it.

Senator KENNEDY opposed the amendment, and then he said:

It stirs up what is already an emotional issue in Panama, without adding to rights of the United States already recognized by the treaty. (Emphasis supplied.)

Obviously, over the weekend, we have been learning about the Panamanian reaction, how they interpret the DeConcini amendment—in light of how they have interpreted all along the Neutrality Treaty.

In a memorandum dated March 28, 1978, Panamana's permanent representative to the United Nations informed the Secretary General of Panama's dissatisfaction with the DeConcini reservation, saying in part:

According to its proponent, the "DeConcini Amendment" is intended to give to the United States of America the unilateral and perpetual right to "take military action on Panamanian soil without the consent of the Panamanian Government", pretending that said amendment must be construed to permit the United States to intervene in Panama in the event of labour unrest, strikes, a slowdown, or under any other pretext labeled as interference with Canal operations.

Treaty supporters have expressed surprise at the reaction in Panama. But the reaction there is fully consistent with the position taken by Panamanian leaders in the aftermath of the Carter-Torrijos joint statement of October 14, 1977. Here is how I summarized the differing interpretations in my floor statement of March 6, 1978:

Indeed—now, as before the joint statement—the two countries are not in agreement on two vital points:

First. Our administration continues to tell the American people that the United States will have the right to defend the canal's neutrality after the year 2000 against any threat, including an internal threat from within Panama. But spokesmen for Panama continue to assert that the United States will have such a right only if the Canal is threatened by a foreign power. Second. Our administration continues to tell the American people that the United States can determine unilaterally when such a threat exists. But Panamanian spokesmen insist that U.S. forces could defend the canal only if requested to do so by Panama or when such action is agreed to by Panama.

The strong Panamanian rection to the Senate's adoption of the DeConcini reservation reinforces the deep concern which I have had all along about the differing interpretations held by the two countries.

Even though the Senate has completed its action on the Neutrality Treaty, it is not too late to undo the mistake we made.

As I see it, there is a clear course that we should follow.

The two treaties are parts of an indivisable whole. One treaty cannot go into effect without the other. Accordingly, instead of adopting the Resolution of Ratification, that will be offered for this treaty, the Senate should adopt instead a substitute along the lines of one that I offered immediately before the final vote on the Neutrality Treaty.

And I shall offer a similar substitute resolution next Tuesday, providing for return of this treaty to the President of the United States, with the advice of the Senate that negotiations be resumed and continued until a more acceptable treaty can be fashioned.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I was interested in the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) with respect to the meaning of the DeConcini amendment when he stated that in the days ahead he felt that some effort should be made to clarify the meaning of the DeConcini amendment. He went on to talk about our time-honored policy of nonintervention in Central and South America and the fact that the DeConcini amendment did not go counter to that and to talk about creating legislative history for the DeConcini amendment.

The door is closed, Mr. President, on legislative history for the DeConcini amendment because that amendment has been agreed to, it has become a part of the resolution of ratification of the Neutrality Treaty, and it has been approved by the United States Senate. And all dialog here on the floor cannot change the meaning of the DeConcini amendment once it has been adopted and once the resolution of ratification has been adopted. It is just like trying to restore Humpty Dumpty. It cannot be done.

Also, Mr. President, we all know that this is called the DeConcini amendment, but it would not have gone one step farther than the amendment to the treaty embodying the language of the DeConcini amendment would have gotten—and it did not get anywhere at all—unless the leadership itself had taken over this amendment and allowed its passage because there has not been one single dotting of an "i" or crossing of a "t" to either of these treaties that has not had the approval of the leadership, the managers, and the administration. So this treaty is theirs. If they have made any mistakes in it, they are their mistakes. It is not the mistake of those of us who are seeking to strengthen these treaties or in the alternative to kill them.

Mr. President, they say, "Let us clarify"—"clarify" is just a code word for weaken—"let us weaken the DeConcini amendment first by legislative history," which cannot be done because the door is closed on that treaty. "If we cannot do that, then let us water it down, let us clarify it, let us dilute it by something added to this treaty."

Mr. President, this treaty ends with the next century. The DeConcini amendment starts with the next century. So how in the world are you going to put a different meaning into the DeConcini amendment starting in the year 2000, when the present treaty ends at the beginning of the year 2000?

Also, Mr. President, are we going to play games with these Senators who sincerely felt that before they could vote for the Neutrality Treaty they had to be assured that the United States would unilaterally have the right to keep that canal open after the year 2000 no matter what it took and to say, "Well, Mr. DECONCINI did not mean what they now say"?

I was very much intrigued at the colloquy between the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) and the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL). And as that colloquy proceeded I noticed the distinguished Senator from Idaho wanted to get ahead and said "Senator, let me answer that question and respond to it." The Senator from Alaska would not hear of that. He said, "We have done something wrong." The Senator from Alaska said, "We have done something wrong in adopting the DeConcini amendment."

And how right he is. But he was not giving the responses that the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) wanted him to give. He was not aiding in the colloquy. So he wanted to give an answer right away. The distinguished Senator from Alaska would not have any of that and he pointed out what a mistake had been made with the DeConcini amendment.

Mr. President, I can see how dictator Torrijos is a most unhappy man. If he, acting as the Government of Panama, agrees to the DeConcini reservation and, as he sees it, impugns upon the sovereignty of the sovereign State of Panama, he will be toppled by his own people, and if he submits the question to a plebiscite, the people will turn the treaty down. So, if there ever was a fellow between Scylla and Charybdis, or between the rock and a hard place, as the modern day expression is, it is dictator Torrijos.

Also, Mr. President, since we seem to be seeking as much approval of this treaty by the Panamanian people in shaping public opinion down in Panama with respect to action here in the Senate, I think the time has come to point out that the supporters of this treaty have been quite adept at pointing out what great friends of the Panamanian people they are and what bad things have been said about Panama and the Panamanian people by Senators who are seeking to strengthen these treaties or, in the alternative, to defeat them. They say, "That is just those individual Senators talking, that is not the whole Senate, as you can tell by the vote."

Mr. President, the record will show who has been standing up for the Panamanian people and who has been standing up for dictator Torrijos. I will proceed to prove that right now.

The argument has been made against every amendment that has been offered except the leadership amendments, which were so deficient, I state, without fear of successful contradiction. Plea has been made and the argument has been made against every amendment, other than the leadership amendments that have been offered, "Do not do this, do not agree to this amendment; if you do we are in danger of having a plebiscite."

What is wrong with that? If we want to trust the Panamanian people, what is wrong with that? Who is casting aspersions upon the Panamanian people by saying, "Don't send this back to them, they might reject it"? Who is standing up for the Panamanian people? Those who want to offer amendments and guarantee that it will go back to the Panamanian people or those who support the treaties and say, "Let us not send it back to a plebiscite"?

So I hope that the Panamanian people will not get the idea that just because those who oppose the treaties have things to say about dictator Torrijos, that they do apply to the great Panamanian people, who are a great people, who want their sovereignty, who are entitled to the sovereignty over their land.

I dare say as I speak of the dictator down in Panama, I do not have any less regard for him than does the average Panamanian down there. That is the reason I think it is so important that this matter be submitted back to a plebiscite so that we can have a compact with the Panamanian people and not just with the Panamanian dictator.

I stated this morning, and the distinguished majority leader was quick to ask me to yield so that he could say he was opposed to my proposed amendment before I could even well explain it, and I suggested that before we concluded action on the treaty, I wanted to assure the right of the Panamanian people to express themselves on this changed treaty.

But the distinguished majority leader quickly got to his feet and announced that he would oppose any such amendment. Who is standing up for the Panamanian people? Who is seeking to give them a voice in agreeing to this treaty? Well, it is not the proponents, it is not the supporters of the treaty. It is those who are seeking to strengthen the treaty or, as I say, an alternative to defeating it. We are the ones who want the Panamanian people to speak, not the supporters of the treaty.

Now, Mr. President, would it be fair at this late date, after both sides have agreed on a date for a vote, to bring in some extraneous matter, something that has already been covered in the other treaty, something which cannot be debated on account of the time limitation, to try to cut down, dilute, the DeConcini amendment? That is not just my saying that is going to be done; that is the distinguished manager of the treaty, the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH). He says something is going to be offered—he does not know what. "But we have got to change this around," is what he says. "We cannot let the DeConcini amendment go out even though it has already been approved," that is what he says, and it was OK'd by the leadership or it would not have passed. Every Senator knows that.

So every single word in this treaty as it now stands, and as the other treaty was approved, was the result either of action by the negotiators or a change approved by the leadership, the managers of the treaties, and the administration.

The opponents of the treaties have not added one single word to the treaties, unless it be said that Mr. DECONCINI would not have voted for the treaty if his reservation had not been added.

How is Mr. DECONCINI going to feel about this? I am sorry he has not been here today. I do not know whether he just has not come back or he is not on the floor.

(Mr. GRAVEL assumed the chair.)

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. No, I will not yield. I will yield for a question, but I do not want to yield for a discussion.

Mr. SARBANES. I just thought in fairness to Senator DECONCINI it ought to be observed that it is my understanding that he returned to his State to meet with his constituency over the weekend and he has not yet come back to Washington.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. Because there was some implication——

Mr. ALLEN. I just do not know that. I just do not know where he is.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator did raise that point. It is my understanding he is at home with his constituency in Arizona.

Mr. ALLEN. I see. Well, I am glad to get that information. I am glad to yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. SARBANES. I appreciate the Senator's yielding for that purpose.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Would it be fair to the distinguished Senator from Arizona who, at this time, is among his constituents getting, I hope, the good advice that the people of Arizona are able to impart to him, would it be fair to him, who would not have agreed to vote for the first treaty without the acceptance of reservation word for word—they tried to water it down in their negotiations with him, and I can say to his credit he would not yield. He said, in effect, "This or nothing."

So now that they accepted his reservation, they accepted the exact wording, it was pushed by the leadership or it would not have been agreed to. we all know that, his vote was obtained, and Senator CANNON voted for the treaty, and it had been—he was not going to vote that way, and he was a cosponsor of the DeConcini reservation—would it be fair to these honorable Senators to undercut or dilute the DeConcini reservation when its acceptance was the method by which victory was obtained in the final vote on the treaty?

I must say, Mr. President, I believe that this victory that was achieved in the approval of this first treaty is going to develop into a hollow victory, because I do not believe this treaty is going to be approved by the Senate.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a few questions?

Mr. ALLEN. Inasmuch as I did not yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, I will state to the Senator, as I did to him, I will yield for a question.

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

What is bothering me here today is there seems to be an attempt to malign Senators here in some of the comments made by the proponents of this treaty by indicating that Senators on this floor have been maligning the people of Panama.

Mr. ALLEN. It would just be the contrary.

Mr. HATCH. That is what I think. Is that not the Senator's recollection?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I say we stand for another plebiscite——

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

Mr. ALLEN (continuing). In Panama to determine whether or not the Panamanian people approve of the treaties as finally agreed to here in the Senate.

The proponents of the treaties, the managers of the treaties, the leadership, the administration want no part of a vote by the people of Panama. They want to deal directly with the dictator.

As I pointed out a moment ago, the dictator is in quite a quandary, because he recognizes public opinion in Panama is now against the treaties, and if he accepts the treaties without a plebiscite, they are going to overthrow him, and if he submits it to a plebiscite, they are going to defeat the treaties.

Mr. HATCH. If I might interrupt the distinguished Senator from Alabama again, my friend and colleague, I would just like to praise the distinguished Senator from Alaska who indicated that his stand today is the same as it was during the DeConcini reservation. He voted against the DeConcini reservation.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right, and I commend him for that nonchange of position.

Mr. HATCH. That is right; and it is very interesting to see who else voted against the DeConcini amendment. Because the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) voted for it. He vociferously supported that amendment.

As I recall the amendment, and I have a copy of it here, it is pretty clear, and the distinguished Senator is correct in why those Senators were pushing for it: so they could have this wonderful language proposed by the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), a man whom all of us admire.

The Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES) supported it. The distinguished Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD) supported it.

But those who did not support it—in other words, those who voted against the DeConcini amendment—were the ranking minority member of the Foreign Relations Committee (Mr. CASE); Mr. CLARK; Mr. CRANSTON; Mr. CULVER; Mr. DURKIN; Mr. GARN voted against it; Mr. GOLDWATER voted against it; Mr. GRAVEL, whom I have complimented here for not changing his position, voted against it; Mr. GRIFFIN voted against it; Mr. HART voted against it; Mr. HATCH—myself, I voted against it; as a matter of fact Mr. JAVITS voted against it, known all over the world for his contributions to foreign relations.

Mr. KENNEDY voted against it. Mr. LAXALT, one of the leaders on the opposion side, voted against it. Mr. MCCLURE voted against it. Mr. MCGOVERN voted against it. Mr. METZENBAUM; Mr. MOYNIHAN—Mr. MOYNIHAN voted against it. Mr. SCHMITT, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. TOWER, and Mr. WEICKER, all voted against the DeConcini amendment, which indicates something here.

Now all of a sudden I see these people—and I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Alabama will not agree—I see these very same people who were outspoken in their support for this amendment making noises all over this floor that somehow or other it is the rest of the Senators who are opponents of these treaties who have caused this problem, because they have been maligning the Panamanians. I have not heard any one malign the Panamanians.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HATCH. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield to me with the same understanding?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am prompted in part, because the name of my junior colleague is being spoken of, and I must say in his defense that he was absolutely sincere in this effort. He and I talked about this for some time, and he introduced it feeling that it was wise.

I might say that that same reservation was introduced as an amendment and roundly defeated by means of a motion to table.

Mr. ALLEN. Correct.

Mr. HATCH. That is right.

Mr. GOLDWATER. A strange thing I wanted to bring back to memory was that when I visited General Torrijos in January, I would say the principal matter we discussed was the subject of the defense of the canal.

Now, he recognized as rapidly as anyone that a national guard total force of 8,500, of whom 1,600 were trained infantrymen, with merely a handful of antiquated armament, could clearly not be expected to defend this canal; and while I cannot stand here and say categorically that we agreed to the subject that we be allowed to stay in perpetuity in the Canal Zone, as I recall it he did agree that there would be no objections to our continuing to train our airborne forces where we had trained them, in conjunction with the Panamanian forces.

So for the general to now be expressing surprise and some shock that the Foreign Relations Committee of the U.S. Senate would endorse U.S. forces remaining in Panama surprises me, unless my memory has completely left me, because he indicated that while it would not be desired, it was recognized that any attempt to invade Panama of any sized force—I am talking about even a battalion—would require more forces than they have, and that such attempts could possibly go on long after the year 2000.

So, frankly, I am going to watch developments with a great deal of interest, because I do not know how the Foreign Relations Committee is going to back off from this one. If it is a hot dog today, it was a hot dog then; and when they, almost to a man, approved this change, those, most of us, who are uninitiated in the subject of foreign policy would have to follow the leadership, because we look to the committees of Congress to guide us laymen through the tortuous paths of that which we do not know.

So, together with the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from Utah, and others, I think we are going to find some very, very interesting legerdemain, hocus-pocus, and dingle-dangle going on here in the next few days, trying to placate what seems to be an angry general in Panama for what the Foreign Relations Committee embraced with full gusto.

I thank my friend from Alabama.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield again, for me to ask one more question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Utah, provided I do not lose my rights to the floor.

Mr. HATCH. It was my understanding that the distinguished Senator from Alabama and a number of others, including myself, have consistently pointed out the disparities and ambiguities in these treaties, and that they raised an awful lot of problems. That is one reason why we have had so many of these substantive amendments to these treaties brought up. The Senator from Michigan indicated that he does not believe these treaties can be repaired with amendments, and that is the reason why he has voted, basically, against almost every amendment.

As I understand it, it has also been the position of the distinguished Senator from Alabama all along that these treaties are fatally defective, that they do not protect Panama or the United States. If I do not misunderstand, I think both the distinguished Senator from Alabama and myself would agree with the distinguished Senator from Michigan that these treaties are not really clear and understandable.

Mr. ALLEN. They are not, to this good day, because we are still arguing about the meaning of the DeConcini amendment, which seemed perfectly clear to me.

I might say that Dictator Torrijos relied on the exchange of correspondence between him and the President on March 15, and we have those letters in the RECORD, in which Torrijos was complaining about some upcoming reservations. The President reassured him that nothing was going to be passed that would interfere with their understanding of the meaning of the treaties.

Well, apparently this does somewhat differ from their understanding of the treaties, it would seem, and no wonder. Let us read the language of the DeConcini amendment. The proponents argue, "Well, he did not mean what he said," but how can they say that about an amendment sponsored by a U.S. Senator which has been gone over with a fine-toothed comb by the administration attorneys, by the Secretary of State and the State Department, by the President himself, by Mr. DECONCINI, who is an outstanding lawyer—how could they say it did not mean what the words say that it meant?

Let us see what it says. We can all read the wording. It was read and supported by the leadership. Let us see what it says:

Before the period at the end of the resolution of ratification—

Right at the tail end, in other words—

insert the following: "subject to the condition, to be included in the instrument of ratification of the treaty to be exchanged with the Republic of Panama—

Now, that is not talking about the resolution of ratification; that is in the exchange of instruments of ratification between the heads of state.

So this condition is to be placed in the exchange of notes between the dictator and the President—

subject to the condition, to be included in the instrument of ratification of the treaty to be exchanged with the Republic of Panama, that, notwithstanding the provisions of Article V—

That is where it says that only Panama, after the year 2000, shall have troops in Panama—or any other provision of the Treaty, if the the Canal is closed, or its operations are interfered with, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall each independently have the right to take such steps as it deems necessary, in accordance with its constitutional processes, including the use of military force in Panama, to reopen the Canal or restore the operations of the Canal, as the case may be.

If they had any interpretation such as they are trying to advance now, I do not know what it is. The distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) said he did not know how to go about it, but something has to be done, something has to be done to change the wording of the DeConcini amendment. How can it be done, when that treaty has already been agreed to by the U.S. Senate, or had been accepted by the U.S. Senate? How will he change it?

The distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), who is present in the Chamber, gave a speech in which he was seeking to set up some sort of legislative history with regard to the DeConcini amendment. How in the world are we going to have legislative history? Legislative history is established to indicate and to explain what the Senate, or what the House in the case of legislative history over there, meant when it passed a given piece of legislation. One cannot think up some 3 weeks later for what was meant by the wording there for the legislative history. The legislative history cannot be changed 3 weeks after the action has been taken. Someone might think up a good reason, "By the way, I thought up a good reason why that amendment does not mean what it says it means. I am going to go to the floor and point out this good reason that the DeConcini amendment does not mean what it says to mean."

(Mr. SASSER assumed the chair.)

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator briefly outline how the recent advocates of the DeConcini amendment might go about changing it?

Mr. ALLEN. With their great majority here in the Senate they can write words into this treaty. By a great use of force then can pass an amendment saying the DeConcini amendment does not mean what he says it meant. I dare say they could get a majority of the Senators. But that will not change the force of public opinion. It will not change the facts. I do not think it will placate the Senators who agreed to vote for this first treaty in return for agreeing to the DeConcini amendment, as interpreted by DECONCINI and others, and as clearly related to the language of the amendment. I believe if they do seek to cut the ground out from under the DeConcini amendment they are going to lose enough votes here on the floor of the Senate to assure the defeat of this treaty.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I will ask my friend further, could that amendment be tabled?

Mr. ALLEN. Well, theoretically it could, yes. But actually the leadership is in control of well over 60 votes and those 60 acting pretty much monolithically could defeat a motion to table.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me ask the Senator one more question. This come to my mind as a layman. Let us say an amendment is offered which would put the meaning of the DeConicin amendment in a different reservation. Would it be possible for this body to vote again on the first treaty of the change in what we might say to be the deciding reservation?

Mr. ALLEN. No. The only way to defeat the Neutrality Treaty, after accepting the DeConcini amendment as written and as explained by Mr. DECONCINI, is to defeat this treaty. The defeat of the Panama Canal Treaty works to defeat the Neutrality Treaty as well, even though it has been approved by the Senate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. HELMS. The fact remains, notwithstanding anything else, that the distinguished Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) advanced his amendment in good faith, is that not correct?

Mr. ALLEN. My attention was diverted. Will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. HELMS. I merely raised the question about our distinguished colleague from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI). There is no question about his good faith in presenting the amendment on the basis which he did, is that correct?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct. And efforts were made, I might say, to dissuade him from insisting on such strong language, but it was necessary to accept his amendment in order to get him to vote for the treaty, to accept his reservation, word for word. They did accept it and now they are saying it is going to be necessary to water it down.

Mr. HELMS. And all that having occurred, he then voted for the neutrality treaty in good faith?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. He stated on the floor that he would not support the treaty if his amendment was not agreed to. Now the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) says it is going to be necessary to pass something to change the meaning which is being attached to the DeConcini amendment. I say that is water over the dam. That treaty has passed. Now if they seek to dilute that amendment in this treaty, it is difficult for me to see how that could be done inasmuch as the treaty we are on now expires in the year 2000, and the treaty with the DeConcini amendment does not even start until the year 2000.

Mr. HELMS. But even if it could be done, it would be an affront to the good faith of the Senator from Arizona, would it not?

Mr. ALLEN. Of course, it would be, and it would be an affront to the Members of the Senate who acted on the same assurance.

Mr. HELMS. I agree with the able Senator. Neither the Senator from Alabama nor the Senator from North Carolina can say with any certainty whether the Neutrality Treaty would have passed without the DeConcini amendment, and without the votes of Senators who accepted the amendment in good faith, but I have a feeling that the treaty would not have passed.

Mr. ALLEN. I was of the opinion that two of the cosponsors of the DeConcini amendment would not have voted for the treaty had not the DeConcini amendment, as written and as explained, been accepted.

Mr. HELMS. And endorsed and supported by the leadership and by the administration. Is that correct?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct. It would not be part of the treaty now if it had not been agreed to by the President himself.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator is obviously correct.

I have some sympathy for the leadership and the sponsors of the treaties in their present anguish, now that some difficulty has arisen as a result of their maneuver in connection with the DeConcini amendment. I am sorry for them. Senator GRIFFIN tried over and over again to warn the Senate of the defects in these treaties. The Senator from Alabama has been eloquent in his warnings. I have done the best I can, as have many others. No heed was paid to the Senator from Alabama, the Senator from Michigan, or to any of the rest of us. This set of circumstances reminds me of Sam Ervin's story about a fellow down in North Carolina who killed his mother and father and then asked the court for mercy on the ground that he was an orphan. The leadership made their own bed in this matter, with great help from the President. I am sorry for them, but they were given fair warning.

Mr. ALLEN. The leadership is responsible for every word in the treaties. They have defended what the negotiators have done and have not allowed anything to be added without their express approval.

Mr. HELMS. And the Senator from Alabama has not added one syllable to the treaty, has he?

Mr. ALLEN. Unfortunately, I have not been able to. It is not that I have not tried.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator has tried valiantly, but he has not managed even to get a "t" crossed or an "i" dotted. Is that correct?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. There are two or three of us who have an important engagement and we would like to find out from the Senator from Alabama if we are going to vote on this tonight and, if we are, when.

Mr. ALLEN. As far as the Senator from Alabama is concerned, I do not believe there will be a vote, but the distinguished managers of the bill could get in at any time and move to table, which would cause a vote. I will say to the distinguished Senator I will not cause a vote this evening. If he can get a similar assurance from the other side, that will dispose of the matter.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Have I responded to all of the inquiries of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HELMS. Yes; and I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Let us see what Mr. DECONCINI said about his amendment:

> The purpose of this amendment is quite simple, Mr. President. It is designed to establish a precondition to American acceptance of the Neutrality Treaty. That precondition states that regardless of the reason and regardless of what any other provision of the Neutrality Treaty might say or what interpretation it might be subject to, if the Panama Canal is closed, the United States has the right to enter Panama, using whatever means are necessary, to reopen the canal. There are no conditions, no exceptions, and no limitations on this right. By the terms of the amendment, the United States interprets when such a need exists, and exercises its own judgment as to the means necessary to insure that the canal remains open and accessible.

Mr. President, what is so bad about that amendment, I think it is a very fine amendment. After all, did not the two leaders, Republican and Democratic, say, when these treaties were first submitted to the Senate, that they could not vote for the treaties and that they would be defeated unless we were given the right unilaterally to intervene? It was only when that memorandum was entered into between the President and the dictator, allowing for a measure of right to defend the canal, and the leadership amendments were evolved, that the distinguished leaders agreed to support the treaties. Were they not driving for the right of unilateral intervention?

Sure, they were. That is what they said they wanted, as the Senator from Alabama recalls. They wanted the right to intervene militarily unilaterally.

Well, they seem to have gotten what they wanted. But the dictator got a very nice provision stuck in the leadership amendment that is not here. It is not in the DeConcini amendment. It was stuck in the leadership amendment or, prior to that, in the memorandum between the President and the dictator. That was that, in our intervention to protect the canal, we would not intervene with the internal affairs of Panama; we would not interfere with their territorial integrity; and we would do nothing to upset the independence of Panama. Those three things were stuck in the leadership amendment, but not the DeConcini amendment.

There, Mr. President, I believe we have the core of the dispute and the difference of opinion and Torrijos' protest because, as long as we just had the leadership amendment, it was so defective and so full of ambiguities and so full of qaulifications that it held no fear or pause for Dictator Torrijos.

But the DeConcini amendment does not have these provisions that the dictator got inserted in the memorandum and that were carried over into the leadership amendment. I believe that is what is eating on them. This does give the United States the unilateral right to keep the canal open.

Mr. President, what sort of respect is that, talking about not according proper respect to Panamanians? I submit that those of us who have sought to improve these treaties and strengthen them or, in the alternative, to kill them, have shown greater respect for the people of Panama and less respect for the dictator than have the supporters of these treaties. Because we have sought, and I say that today, I was going to offer an amendment requiring this treaty to go back to the Panamanian people, showing that I have confidence in their good judgment. All through action on both of these treaties, if any amendment was offered, they would say, "Oh, we cannot vote for that; it might cause another plebiscite."

Does that show respect for the people of Panama, wanting to follow their will, their wishes, or show respect for Dictator Torrijos in wanting to follow his wishes?

This $100 million a year that Torrijos is going to get out of this treaty is what is going to keep him afloat. That is what is going to keep his dictatorial regime afloat. I would not be at all surprised, if we were to tailor this treaty to suit the best interests of the people of the United States and require a plebiscite, not only would the treaty be disapproved by the Panamanian people, but Mr. Torrijos would get his walking papers.

I think that would be a fine day for Panama if democracy should return to that fine republic, consisting of some fine American—and I say that in the broad sense—American people. I respect the great people of Panama and I want them to have a part in deciding this controversy. If we have overstepped our bounds when we have, by recommendation of the leadership, agreed to the DeConcini amendment, let us let the people of Panama say whether we have or not. Let us give them a voice in this issue and, at the proper time, I hope that the Senate will agree to this amendment sending this treaty back to Panama.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. I had planned to yield to the distinguished Senator from Utah, but inasmuch as my distinguished friend, the distinguished majority leader, wishes me to yield, I yield to him.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have been listening to the debate. I ask the Senator, is the DeConcini amendment back before the Senate at this time?

Mr. ALLEN. It has been injected into the discussion in this fashion. The distinguished majority leader must not have been listening at the time the distinguished Senator from Idaho was speaking, when he said that something is going to have to be done to indicate a different meaning to the DeConcini amendment; that he did not know how it was going to be done, but that it would have to be done. That is how the issue came into the debate at this time.

I state to the distinguished Senator from Alaska, who has been supporting the treaties up to now—I do not know what his position might be now, but he stated that we went too far in agreeing to the DeConcini amendment; that he does not believe, if I correctly heard him, that it can be cured by an amendment to this treaty, inasmuch as the door has been closed on the other treaty and no legislative history can affect what has already taken place.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. May I ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. An amendment by Mr. HATCH is pending, is that correct?

Mr. ALLEN. That is correct. But when I come into the Chamber, the distinguished Senator from Idaho was speaking of legislative history with respect to the DeConcini amendment. That is how it came in at this late hour of the day.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Very well. I wonder if we could reach an agreement to vote on the pending Hatch amendment, say at 5:45 p.m. today?

Mr. ALLEN. I would have no objection, except the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON) asked the Senator from Alabama if there was going to be a vote and I stated, "Not as far I am concerned."

The motion might be made to table.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. To table the amendment, and that I would not anticipate that there would be a vote.

I had not thought there would.

I would have no objection to agreeing to vote the first thing in the morning, but I do have my word out to the distinguished Senator from Washington.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I would be glad to get in touch with the distinguished Senator from Washington.

Mr. ALLEN. I would have no objection.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I wonder if we could agree to vote, say, at no later than 6 o'clock p.m.?

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRAVEL. I would have an objection.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. He would have an objection.

Mr. GRAVEL. I certainly would. I have been very patient. I waited around part of the afternoon. I would like to express myself on this, and I do not want to have it interrupted by a vote because we have had the opponents cackling here for the last hour over difficulty that we may have on our side, and I think there should be an explanation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I really am not aware of any difficulties. I heard all day long that these crocodile tears have been shed. The carpet is wet where I stand. Everywhere I see the carpet is wet. There have been so many tears about all the difficulties that have arisen—and I know of none, really—but I would defer if the Senator is not in the mood to vote. How about 6:30?

Mr. GRAVEL. I would have not objection if I could get the floor and be recognized and make my expression of views.

I have been very patient, and I am prepared to, if it takes all night.

But I think there is another side that should be presented, and I have intended to present that other side before voting on any specific amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I have no objection, I might say to the distinguished majority leader, I think, on a vote first thing in the morning, and I have no objection to a vote if we could get the approval of the distinguished Senator from Washington, to whom I am committed not to allow it to come to a vote, unless a motion to table——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Well, Mr. MAGNUSON is still here. I am sure we would have no trouble with Mr. MAGNUSON.

What does the Senator from Utah say?

Mr. HATCH. We brought it up around noon today. I spoke for about half an hour and we have not had any chance to debate it.

I understand there are other Senators who want to speak. I, again, need to speak to it. Senator SARBANES has indicated he needs to speak shortly on this amendment.

Mr. SARBANES. Very shortly, I assure the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. Well, I might add, there have been some Senators come up to me who have noticed how long this debate has taken today and have asked we vote tomorrow morning.

I really think we will need some time. I think we could finish the debate tonight. But I would recommend, if it is possible, because of some of the Senators who felt this was going on and on, that we vote tomorrow morning the first thing.

I would be more than happy to do that, and finish up whatever debate there is on this this evening, if both sides may be heard, and then vote the first thing tomorrow.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. All right.

May I ask the Chair, on what article are we at this point, just for the record?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is debating article III.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And there are how many articles, 14?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fourteen articles.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. One annex, 1 minute, and we have 3 days left to debate the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader is substantially correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I just want to express concern on the part of Senators who may have amendments to various articles that we do not run out of time without their having time to offer their amendments.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. HATCH. I would be happy to set mine aside while others are brought up today and have back-to-back votes tomorrow, if that would make the majority leader happy.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does the Senator have another amendment?

Mr. HATCH. I have another amendment, but not to this article.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I see no need to set it aside and bring up another.

Mr. HATCH. It has been set aside all day.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. If we can get a vote on another amendment today, that would be agreeable.

I do not have the floor, but the Senator from North Carolina——

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Provided I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, with that understanding, I will say to the majority leader, that I have three amendments.

I would be perfectly willing to enter into a time agreement on, say, two of them this evening, and not have a vote on either of them and carry the votes over to tomorrow. That will get two of my several amendments out of the way.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Are they to this article?

Mr. HELMS. No, they are to the next article, but I want to do anything I can to expedite matters. But, to answer the Senator's question my amendments are addressed to the next article.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. They are. Very well. We will talk about the Senator's amendments and possibly be able to reach an agreement before the Senate goes out.

Mr. HELMS. I merely want to help, if I can, with what may develop into a time problem later this week.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. I agree with the majority leader. The clock is running and as the Senator has indicated we need to get on with it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

I thank the Senator from Alabama for such time as he yielded.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

As I understand, we have gotten nowhere with respect to setting a time for a vote, is that correct?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I believe the distinguished Senator from Alaska has indicated he wishes to address some remarks to the pending amendment.

Mr. GRAVEL. Not to the pending amendment, but to the subject raised, which has really occupied our time for most of the afternoon. The amendment is of no concern to me.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Let me ask once more, is it possible to get a vote in relation to the pending amendment by, say, 6:30 p.m. today, or by 7, no later than 7?

Mr. GRAVEL. I would have no objection if I could get the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. May I make this inquiry, inasmuch as the debate in which the Senator wishes to participate really has nothing to do with the pending amendment, could we vote on the pending amendment and then allow the Senator from Alabama to resume his discussion? Then we would suit everybody. We would have a vote and we would still have our debate.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I hope the Senator from Alaska——

Mr. GRAVEL. If we vote right now, and then if the Senator would continue as long as he feels necessary, as long as it is not past midnight——

Mr. ALLEN. Twenty or twenty-five minutes.

But if we can vote now, let me resume the floor for a limited time, it will not be long, and then the distinguished Senator from Alaska could be——

Mr. GRAVEL. Might I ask my colleague, since he has occupied the floor for a 20-minute period with the opponents of the treaty, might he not give me the courtesy to have 15 minutes after the vote and then he could retort, so we could really have a dialog?

We have been listening to the cackle, and I do not mind that, but I think we might have a little give and take.

Mr. ALLEN. I say to the Senator from Alaska, there was no cackling, as far as I am concerned, but possibly a few smiles.

Mr. GRAVEL. I think he is entitled to it. I think anybody that throws gasoline on a fire and then laughs over people having difficulty putting out the fire——

Mr. ALLEN. I do not yield any further to the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. If the Senator will yield to me, I believe I see the possibility here of our voting in relation to the Hatch amendment.

I ask unanimous consent that a vote occur in relation to the Hatch amendment at 6 o'clock p.m., with the time to be equally divided between now and 6 o'clock between Mr. HATCH or his designee and Mr. CHURCH or his designee.

Mr. GRAVEL. Reserving the right to object, and I shall object, I think we are on a much more meaningful subject than the Hatch amendment. I do not think we should let go of it. It is really going to determine what the future will be with these treaties, so we could go ahead and have our amendments—I am explaining my reservation—if the Senator from Alabama has a filibuster going on and wants to go on, I am prepared to sit here and listen all night and after he is done I will take my turn in expressing my views.

So I do not think we should interrupt the Senator from Alabama if he wants——

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. SARBANES. Do I correctly understand that the suggestion of the Senator from Alabama was that we take a short but reasonable period of time to make closing remarks, as it were, on the Hatch amendment, and vote; that then the Senator from Alabama thought the debate could be resumed, and I take it that it could be worked out between him and the Senator from Alaska on how there can be an exchange? Was that essentially the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I stated that I would not occupy the floor longer than an additional 25 minutes—in that range. I am not trying to prolong the matter.

I really think the distinguished Senator from Alaska should not have stated that the Senator from Alabama had a filibuster going, because he does not have. I am only trying to answer what the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) had to say by way of supposed legislative history and about seeking to undercut the meaning of the DeConcini amendment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I talked with the distinguished Senator from Alaska, and I believe that I detect the possibility that we could vote in relation to the Hatch amendment within 10 minutes, so we can limit the debate on the Hatch amendment, 5 minutes to a side; and after that amendment is disposed of, we can carry on with the debate of the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Alaska, both holding forth.

Mr. ALLEN. Provided the Senator from Alabama has the floor. Provided he is recognized immediately after the vote on the Hatch amendment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator from Alabama has indicated that he would not like to hold the floor for very long.

Mr. ALLEN. I said I thought I would conclude my remarks in the range of 25 minutes, give or take 5 minutes.

Mr. GRAVEL. Is that a unanimous consent request the leadership is propounding?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. GRAVEL. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object—

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GRAVEL. Because I think we should go forward with this, and I will be happy to sit here for 25 or 50 minutes or 2 hours and listen to the Senator from Alabama propound it.

Where I did get a little uptight—and I apologize to the leadership for that—was when Senator SARBANES wanted to address an inquiry to the Senator from Alabama, and the latter would not entertain it. But then he proceeded to entertain it from Senator GOLDWATER, Senator HATCH, and Senator HELMS. I do not mind that, either. He is entitled to do that. But I think if we want to give the color of fairness, we should be precise in how we do this, and not just spill the bucket and think we are fair.

Mr. ALLEN. I yielded twice.

Mr. GRAVEL. I withdraw any objection.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I hate to add to the Senator's difficulty—I have a problem with reference to the distinguished Senator from Virginia, who is on his way to Richmond.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I will give him a live pair. We will have one Byrd against the other—two Byrds with one vote.

[Laughter.]

That will beach my perfect voting record, but I am willing to do it.

Mr. HELMS. Of course, that would be quite satisfactory to the Senator from North Carolina, but I do not know whether it will be satisfactory to the Senator from Virginia. What is the difficulty in carrying the vote over until tomorrow?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No difficulty.

Mr. HATCH. Especially since I am willing to set aside this amendment and go ahead with other amendments.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. We can call up another amendment.

Mr. HATCH. I do care a great deal for the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I wonder whether I might check with the office of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) and see if it would be agreeable to him for me to give him a live pair.

Mr. HELMS. If it is agreeable with his office, of course it would be agreeable to me.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Let us get the agreement, conditioned on that.

Mr. ALLEN. I call to the attention of the distinguished majority leader the fact that he said he would make it agreeable to the distinguished Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON). On that condition, I would agree.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield the floor, under the unanimous-consent agreement. As I understand, debate is now to be confined to the Hatch amendment, and there will be a vote. I yield the floor, on that condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, with respect to the deferral of the Hatch amendment, it has been very interesting to hear the colloquies which have taken place as a result of the incidents over the weekend.

Some of us have pointed out some of the difficulties the proponents have been having, it seems to me, in trying to foist the responsibility for these language and interpretation and disparity difficulties with the treaties upon the opponents of the treaties, indicating that the opponents have made statements deprecatory to the Panamanians and perhaps have not conducted themselves with respect for Panama, which of course is not the case.

The fact is that we have shown great deference to the people of Panama and will continue to do so, because we think a great deal of the people. The only instance I know of in which there has been any harsh language was an instance in which it was totally justified, on the basis of bringing out the drug connections with Mr. Torrijos' two brothers and others in Panama. I believe it is justified to speak about those types of incidents in Panama as being deleterious not only to this country but also to Panama.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, who will speak with regard to my amendment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the office of Senator HARRY F. BYRD, JR., has informed me that it will be perfectly agreeable to the Senator for me to announce a pair with him.

Mr. HATCH. What is our agreement for today? We are going to continue until what time?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. We have 10 minutes, equally divided.

Mr. HATCH. Shall we start right now with the 10 minutes?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The agreement was that we start a moment ago, but it is all right with me to start now.

Mr. HATCH. I yield to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the 10 minutes begin to run now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the distinguished majority leader for clearing up that dilemma concerning the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by Senator HATCH is needed to insure that the Republic of Panama understands and accepts the fact that payments made to it out of Panama Canal revenues must and will be made subject to the constitutionally required appropriations process of the U.S. Congress.

Every U.S. Senator knows the provision of article 1, section 9 of the Constitution:

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law.

The Hatch amendment sets up a clear process by which this time-honored guideline of our Founding Fathers shall be dutifully adhered to, rather than bypassed.

Article III of the Panama Canal Treaty includes this language:

5. The Panama Canal Commission shall reimburse the Republic of Panama for the cost incurred by the Republic of Panama in providing the following public services . . .

And so forth.

Article XIII has this language:

4. The Republic of Panama shall receive, in addition, from the Panama Canal Commission a just and equitable return on the national resources which it has dedicated to the efficient management, operation, maintenance, protection and defense of the Panama Canal, in accordance with the following:

And then it goes on with the financial arrangements we are all familiar with.

The implementing legislation submitted by the State Department contains this language:

The Panama Canal Commission shall pay directly from Canal operating revenues to the Republic of Panama those payments required under paragraph 4 of article XIII of the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977.

The point is this, Mr. President: The Panama Canal Treaty will remain an imperfect treaty, and in my opinion, inoperative, without the exercise by Congress of the appropriations power in the matter of transferring funds to Panama in connection with the matters dealt with in the treaty and implementing legislation.

Department of State witnesses have acknowledged before various congressional committees that payments to Panama are subject to legislation.

The Senator from North Carolina fears, however, that the State Department may hold to the position that mere passage of the implementing legislation will be sufficient.

As I have just quoted it, that legislation states the Panama Canal Commission will make direct payments to the Republic of Panama.

However, there is nothing in the treaties or the implementing legislation as proposed that indicates any necessity for scrutiny and authorization of such transfers of moneys specifically under the appropriations process of the U.S. Congress.

Mr. President, legislation cannot and does not amend the Constitution. Passage of the legislation implementing these treaties will not amend the Constitution to make unnecessary the appropriations process called for by our Constitution.

So the pending amendment of the distinguished Senator from Utah will clarify this important matter. It not only will clarify the issue; it will establish the very procedures by which the transfers of moneys shall be made in full conformity with our constitutional requirements.

And, as I have indicated at the beginning of my remarks, it will establish a clear understanding between the two Republics as to the basis and the processes on which and by which those transfers of moneys shall be made.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina will not take any more time at this point to expand on his view. Let me just repeat, Senators all know the Constitution.

For an exhaustive treatment of that issue which the Hatch amendment addresses I want to call to the attention of the Senate an excellent paper compiled by W. M. Whitman, former Secretary of the Panama Canal Company, and now a consultant to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Whitman's paper dated November 1977, is entitled, "Panama Canal Treaty Payments and the Constitutional Power of Congress to Make Appropriations".

Mr. President, I want to pay tribute to Mr. Whitman for his diligence in the preparation of works such as this paper which have rendered great assistance to both Houses of Congress. The action of the Senate in pursuing various aspects of the treaties has been greatly aided by the background information and insights provided by Mr. Whitman.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this paper be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PANAMA CANAL TREATY PAYMENTS AND THE CONSTITUTIONAL POWER OF CONGRESS TO MAKE APPROPRIATIONS

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Question Presented

The question addressed in this memorandum is whether under Article I, section 9 of the Constitution, appropriations by the Congress are necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the proposed Panama Canal treaty for annual payments to Panama.

B. Summary

In summary, the memorandum concludes that under Article I, section 9 of the Constitution, provisions of a treaty for payment of money do not become effective as domestic law in the absence of appropriation of the necessary funds by the Congress. Under the treaties with Panama now in effect, which also provide for annual payments to Panama, revenues derived from operation of the canal are treated as public moneys and expenditures of those funds are limited to those authorized by appropriation acts of the Congress. There is nothing in the language of the proposed treaty to take the annual payments to Panama provided by the treaty out of the operation of the general rule or to distinguish such payments from those provided by the existing treaties so far as concerns the application of Article I, section 9 of the Constitution. Accordingly, such payments may not be made without Congressional appropriations in the consideration of which, in the language of a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives in 1795, the Congress has the obligation to act as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good.

II. CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

The three constitutional provisions directly involved are Article I, section 9, clause 7, the power to make appropriations; Article II, section 2, clause 2, the treaty power; and Article VI, clause 2, the supremacy clause. The text of these several clauses is set out below:

Art. I, sec. 9, cl. 7:

"No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; . . ."

Art. II, sec. 2, cl. 2:

"He [the President] shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; . . ."

Art. IV, cl. 2:

"This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the land; . . ."

It is settled that the power of the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties with foreign countries extends to all proper subjects of negotiation between the United States and other countries.[1] It is also clear that such treaties may extend to subjects that are also within the legislative power of the Congress, i.e., a treaty is not necessarily invalid because it deals with a subject on which Congress has the power to legislate.[2] A treaty does not affect the power of the Congress to enact legislation on the same subject. In the event of a conflict between the treaty and the law, the later in time prevails.[3]

Once made, a treaty operates in a dual role: in its international aspect, it is a contract between the United States and the country with which it is made giving rise to rights and obligations under international law; [4] and under the supremacy clause of the constitution, a treaty takes effect as domestic law unless, in terms, it is made dependent on further legislative action by the Congress,[5] or unless the provisions of the treaty are in conflict with other provisions of the constitution.[6]

Analysis of the effect of a treaty as domestic law is usually cast in terms of whether or not the treaty is self-executing, i.e., whether it takes effect as domestic law without further action by the Congress. The state of the law in this respect is summarized as follows by the American Law Institute: [7]

"(1) A treaty made on behalf of the United States in conformity with the constitutional limitations indicated in § 118, that manifests an intention that it shall become effective as domestic law of the United States at the time it becomes binding on the United States.

"(a) is self-executing in that it is effective as domestic law of the United States.

"(b) supersedes inconsistent provisions of earlier acts of Congress or of the law of the several states of the United States.

"(3) A treaty cannot be self-executing under the rule stated in subsection (1) and have the effect stated therein to the extent that it involves governmental action that under the Constitution can be taken only by the Congress."

The provisions of the proposed Panama Canal treaty for annual payments to Panama by the U.S. Government agency to be established to operate the canal, raise directly the question whether such provisions are self-executing in view of Article I, sec. 9, cl. 7 of the constitution limiting to the Congress to the power to make appropriations.

There appears to be no controversy whatever as to the constitutional validity of treaty provisions under which the United States undertakes to make payments of money.[8] The first treaty made by the Government of the United States after the adoption of the constitution, the Jay Treaty of Footnotes at end of article.

1794 with Great Britain, provided for payment of debts owed by U.S. citizens or inhabitants to British creditors; [9] the treaties with France for the cession of Louisiana provided for payment to France of 60 million francs; [10] the Treaty of Paris, ending the Spanish-American War, provided for the payment of $20 million to Spain for the Philippine Islands; [11] the 1903 convention with Panama providing for construction and maintenance of the Panama Canal, provided for a lump sum payment to Panama of $10 million and annual payments of $250,000.[12] These examples could be duplicated many times over and in no instance has such a treaty provision been challenged as beyond the constitutional power of the President.[13]

If, as appears to be the case, Article I, sec. 9, cl. 7 of the constitution does not preclude the negotiation of a treaty providing for the payment of money by the United States, the conclusion is otherwise in respect to attempts to set up a procedure for transfer of funds in discharge of the treaty commitment without an appropriation by Congress.

After the ratification of the Jay treaty, the effect of the provisions of the treaty requiring expenditure of funds was debated at length in the House of Representatives. The debate did not involve the question whether the President could enter into a treaty requiring the expenditure of funds; the two questions at issue were (1) whether the House of Representatives was entitled to obtain copies of instructions given by the President to the negotiators, and (2) whether the Congress was required to appropriate the funds necessary to carry the treaty into effect, in view of the provision of Art. VI, clause 2 of the constitution declaring that treaties along with the constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land.[14] President Washington rejected the demand of the House for copies of the instructions to negotiators,[15] but the House adopted a resolution introduced by Thomas Blount, vigorously supported by James Madison, providing as follows:

"When a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the Constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good." [16]

Congress thereafter enacted a law making the necessary appropriations.[17]

When difficulties arose in the execution of Art. VI of the Jay treaty, providing for payment by the United States of certain debts owing by U.S. debtors to British creditors, a second convention was negotiated and ratified providing for discharging the responsibility of the United States under Art. VI by payment of 600,000 pounds sterling in three equal annual installments.[18] On April 27, 1802, President Jefferson sent copies of the convention to the Congress with a brief message concluding as follows:

"I now transmit copies thereof to both Houses of Congress, trusting that, in the free exercise of the authority which the Constitution has given them on the subject of public expenditures they will deem it for the public interest to appropriate the sums necessary for carrying this convention into execution." [19]

The same principles were recognized and the same procedure was followed in reference to the three treaties with France for cession of Louisiana to the United States. In Article I of the second of the three treaties, the United States agreed "to pay to the French Government, in the manner specified in the following article, the sum of sixty millions of francs. . . ." Article II specified that payment to France would be effected by issuance of stock of $11,250,000 bearing interest at the rate of 6 percent, with a further provision for retirement of the principal in annual payments of $3 million, commencing 15 years after the date of the exchange of ratifications.[20] In his message to Congress on October 17, 1803, President Jefferson referred to the treaties with the statement that after ratification "they will without delay, be communicated to the Representatives for the exercise of their functions as to those conditions which are within the powers vested by the Constitution in the Congress." [21]

On October 21, 1803, the date of the ratification of the treaties, the President forwarded copies to the Senate and House of Representatives with a message which, after referring to his earlier message of October 17, in reference to the treaties, concluded:

"These, with the advice and consent of the Senate having now been ratified, . . . they are communicated to you for consideration in your legislative capacity. You will observe that some important conditions cannot be carried into execution, but with the aid of the Legislature, and that time presses a decision on them without delay." [22]

Adherence to the view that provisions of treaties for the payment of money by the United States are not self-executing, but that Congress is required to exercise independent judgment in considering appropriations for such payments, has not been confined to the House of Representatives.

During the debates in the Senate on entry by the United States into the League of Nations and related treaties negotiated at the end of World War I, a resolution was introduced to request the Judiciary Committee to advise the Senate as to whether there was any constitutional objection to one of the treaties providing for military assistance to France. In the course of a comprehensive review and analysis of the treaty making power, Senator Kellogg (who was later to become Secretary of State) referred to the exclusive power of the Congress to make appropriations as follows:

". . . it is well settled that while the treaty-making power can obligate the United States to the payment of the sums of money, it can not itself appropriate from the United States Treasury the amounts specified or compel the Congress to provide for their payment . . . Undoubtedly nations dealing with the treaty-making power are presumed to have knowledge of this limitation." [23]

The relationship of the supremacy clause and the constitutional power of Congress to make appropriations was considered in the federal circuit court at an early date in a case involving the effect of an 1836 treaty with an Indian tribe, which among other things, provided for payment of the net proceeds of the sale of 160 acres of land to the owner of the buildings on the land. In that case the court said:

"A treaty under the Federal Constitution is declared to be the Supreme law of the land. This, unquestionably, applies to all treaties, where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and cannot be the Supreme law of the land, where the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect. Until this power is exercised, as where the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative, in the sense of the Constitution, as money cannot be appropriated by the treaty making power. This results from the limitations of our government. . . . As well might it be contended that an ordinary act of Congress, without the signature of the President, was a law, as that a treaty which engages to pay money, is in itself a law. . . . It [the treaty-making power] cannot bind or control the legislative action in this respect, and every foreign government may be presumed to know that as far as the treaty stipulates to pay money, the legislative action is required.[24] (Emphasis supplied.)

The view that a treaty provision for the payment of money is not self-executing but requires an appropriation by the Congress is also reflected in the American Law Institute comment on section 141 of its restatement of foreign relations law, quoted above, which states:

"f. Constitutional limitation on self-executing treaties. Even though a treaty is cast in the form of a self-executing treaty, it does not become effective as domestic law in the United States upon becoming binding between the United States and the other party or parties, if it deals with a subject matter that by the Constitution is reserved exclusively to Congress. For example, only the Congress can appropriate money from the Treasury of the United States.[22]

"Ilustration:

8. The United States enters into a treaty with State A under which A agrees to cede a portion of its territory to the United States in return for payment of $7,200,000. Advice and consent to the ratification of the treaty is given by the Senate and it is ratified by the President. The ratification does not have the effect of appropriating the $7,200,000. Further action to this effect must be taken by both Houses of Congress.[25]

This view of the effect of Article I, section 9 has not been disputed by the Department of State in the hearings on the Panama Canal treaties signed in September 1977. In hearings on the treaties before a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the Legal Adviser of the Department of State conceded that Article 1, sec. 9, cl. 7 of the Constitution constitutes a limitation on the impose taxes nor directly appropriate funds." [26]

Similarly, at hearings on the treaty on September 29, 1977, Attorney General Griffin Bell advised the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that:

"It is generally assumed that the specific powers granted to the House of Representatives and the Congress in fiscal matters (Article I, section 7, clause 1 and Article I, section 9, clause 7, money bills and appropriation power) preclude making treaties self-executing to the extent that they involve the raising of revenue or the expenditure of funds. Were it otherwise, President and Senate could bypass the power of Congress and in particular of the House of Representatives over the pursestrings."

In the light of the constitutional principles summarized above, it appears that the provisions of the proposed Panama Canal treaty for payments to Panama are not self-executing but require legislative action by the Congress unless there is some special element involved in the treaty provisions or in the nature of the canal operation that would serve to take the payments to Panama out of the operation of the constitutional rules that would otherwise apply. Review of the pertinent treaty provisions and of the legal and fiscal characteristics of the operation of the canal, either at present or under the proposed treaties, discloses no such distinguishing characteristics.

III. PANAMA CANAL TREATIES AND OPERATING STRUCTURE

A. 1903 Treaty

In 1902 an act of Congress, popularly known as the Spooner Act, authorized the President to acquire control of the land and other rights necessary for the construction and operation of a transisthmian canal and to proceed with the construction of such a canal when such rights were obtained.[27] After an abortive effort to obtain the necessary rights in a treaty with Colombia, and following secession of Panama from the Republic of Colombia, the United States on November 18, 1903, entered into a treaty with the Republic of Panama providing for the acquisition by the United States of the rights specified in the Spooner Act and for the construction and operation by the United States of a transisthmian canal at Panama. Article XIV provides that:

"As the price or compensation for the rights, powers, and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of ten million dollars ($10,000,000) in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000) in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid. . . ."

B. 1936 Treaty

A treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama signed March 2, 1936,[28] among other provisions, abrogated certain provisions of the 1903 treaty, and placed restrictions on residence, importations, and commercial activity in the Canal Zone.[29] Article VII of the 1936 treaty increased the amount of the annuity payable to the Republic of Panama under Article XIV of the 1903 treaty to four hundred thirty thousand Balboas (B/430,000) as defined in a separate monetary agreement, effected by an exchange of notes on the same date as the treaty. The treaty authorized payment of the annuity in any coin or currency provided the amount so paid was the equivalent of B/430,000 as defined in the monetary agreement.

C. 1955 Treaty

A third treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, signed January 25, 1955,[30] contained among other provisions, an article that increased the annuity to one million nine hundred thirty thousand Balboas (B/1,930,000) as defined by the agreement embodied in the exchange of notes of March 2, 1936, but authorized the United States to discharge its obligation with respect to payment of the annuity in any coin or currency provided the amount so paid is the equivalent of one million nine hundred thirty thousand Balboas (B/1,930,000) as so defined.[31]

D. Panama Canal Organizational Structure

Construction of the Panama Canal was accomplished by the Isthmian Canal Commission under the provisions of the Spooner Act, supra. As construction approached completion, Congress passed the Panama Canal Act of August 24, 1912,[32] providing for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone. The Act authorized the President to discontinue the Isthmian Canal Commission and to complete, govern and operate the Panama Canal through a Governor of the Panama Canal. The pertinent provisions of the Panama Canal Act were later incorporated in the Canal Zone Code, enacted in 1934.[33]

The adjuncts of the Panama Canal, referred to in the Panama Canal Act, were principally consolidated in the operations of the Panama Railroad Company, originally created in 1849 under the laws of the State of New York as a private corporation for the construction and operation of a railroad across the Isthmus of Panama. At the time of the construction of the Panama Canal all the stock of the Company was acquired by the United States and, after the canal was completed, the railroad conducted certain business operations supporting the maintenance and operation of the canal, including operation of a transisthmian railroad, a steamship line operating between the United States and the Canal Zone, docks, harbor terminals, coaling plants for bunkering ships, commissaries for supplying employees and ships, dry and cold storage plants, hotels, and the telephone system of the Canal Zone. The Supreme Court has characterized these operations as auxiliaries primarily designed and used to aid in the canal's management and operation,[34] and they have been similarly described by the Congressional Committees responsible for Panama Canal affairs.[35]

In 1945, the Government Corporation Control Act[36] designated the Panama Railroad Company as a wholly-owned government corporation and prohibited the existence of any such wholly-owned government corporations created under the laws of a state. Accordingly, in 1948, the Panama Railroad Company was reincorporated under a federal charter with authority to continue its operation in support of the maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal.[37]

Under legislation enacted in 1950, a basic change in the organizational structure of the enterprise became effective July 1, 1951.[38] One purpose of the reorganization was to separate the business operations of the canal enterprise, including operation of the waterway, from those functions associated with civil government of the Canal Zone. All the functions of the agency previously known as The Panama Canal, except those relating to civil government, health and sanitation were transferred to the Panama Railroad Company which was renamed the Panama Canal Company. The Panama Canal agency retained its governmental functions and was renamed the Canal Zone Government. A second purpose of the reorganization was to give the Panama Canal Company authority to prescribe the rates of tolls for use of the canal, subject to final approval by the President.[39] Previously, power to prescribe rates of tolls had been vested exclusively in the President since the enactment of the Panama Canal Act in 1912.[40]

The basic provisions of the 1950 reorganization legislation were subsequently incorporated into the 1962 edition of the Canal Zone Code.[40] Under the statutory scheme, the Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone Government function as an integrated enterprise although each is an independent agency of the United States.[41]

The Panama Canal Company is described in the law as a body corporate and an agency of the United States for the purpose of maintaining and operating the Panama Canal and conducting business operations incident thereto and incident to the civil government of the Canal Zone.[42]

The powers of the Company are enumerated in its charter.[43] In general, the principal activities of the Company are (1) operations directly involved in the movement of ships through the canal and (2) supporting services. The latter include vessels repairs, harbor terminals, a railroad across the Isthmus, a supply ship operating between the United States and the Canal Zone, motor transportation facilities, storehouses, an electric power system, a communications system, a water system, and service activities essential for meeting the needs of employees, such as living quarters, commissaries and restaurants.

Under its charter the Company is required to be self-sustaining although appropriations are authorized to cover any operating losses,[44] or for the capital improvements.[45] Appropriations for operating losses are required to be repaid.

The Company is also required to reimburse the Treasury for interest on the net direct investment of the United States in the corporation at rates fixed annually by the Secretary of the Treasury,[46] for the annuity paid under the 1903 treaty as amended by the 1936 treaty, and for the net cost of operation of the agency known as the Canal Zone Government.[47]

The Board of Directors of the Company is required to review annually its working capital requirements together with foreseeable requirements for plant replacements and expansion and to pay any amounts in excess thereof into the Treasury.[48] Since 1950 the Company has paid $40 million into the Treasury for this purpose.

IV. FISCAL MANAGEMENT OF GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

Article III of the proposed Panama Canal treaty specifies that the U.S. Government agency to be established to operate the canal "shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States." The laws of the United States governing the fiscal management of government agencies in general are incorporated in Title 31 of the U.S. Code.[49]

The Executive Departments and non-corporate federal agencies are subject generally to the provisions of title 31, except the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act. Wholly owned government corporations are subject to the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act and to many of the other provisions of title 31 as well.

The provisions of title 31 clearly delineate the fiscal responsibilities of government agencies generally and their dependence on appropriations to authorize the expenditure of funds. The Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, defines "department or establishment" to include "any executive department, independent commission, board, bureau, office, agency or other establishment of the Government," and the term "appropriations" to include funds and authorizations to create obligations by contract in advance of appropriations or "any other authority making funds available for obligation or expenditure."[50] All moneys received from whatever source for use of the United States are required to be paid into the Treasury.[51] Detailed provisions are made for submission of estimates for appropriations for expenditure by government agencies.[52] Expenditures in excess of appropriations are prohibited, and all appropriations or funds made available for obligation are required to be apportioned to avoid the necessity for deficiency or supplemental appropriations.[53]

Agencies of the government in corporate form, such as the agency now responsible for operation of the Panama Canal, are established pursuant to and operate in accordance with the Government Corporation Control Act, and other applicable provisions of title 31 of the United States Code. The Government Corporation Control Act requires a government agency subject to the Act to submit annually to the Congress, through the Office of Management and Budget and the President, a budget program which among other things must include a statement of financial condition and of income and expense, a statement of sources and application of funds, and such other supplementary statements and information as are necessary or desirable to make known the financial condition and operation of the corporation.[54] The Congress, after consideration of the budget program, is required to enact legislation "making necessary appropriations, as may be authorized by law, making available for expenditure for operating and administrative expenses such corporate funds or other financial resources, or limiting the use thereof as the Congress may determine and providing for repayment of capital funds and the payment of dividends."[55] The legislation making funds available for payment of expenses of the corporation is regularly incorporated in the annual appropriation acts enacted by the Congress.[56] Accounts of corporations are required to be kept with the Treasury, or with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, with a Federal Reserve Bank or a bank designated as a depository or fiscal agent of the United States.[57] Agencies in corporate as well as non-corporate form are subject to the provisions of the anti-deficiency act requiring apportionment of all appropriations or funds made available for obligation.[58]

V. PANAMA CANAL FUNDS AND PAYMENTS TO PANAMA UNDER PRESENT TREATIES

A. Panama Canal Funds

The basic framework for operation of the Panama Canal under the 1903 treaty was provided by section 5 of the Panama Canal Act referred to in Part III of this memorandum. Under that Act, the President was authorized to prescribe "tolls that shall be levied by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal" which were required to be fixed at rates sufficient to pay the estimated cost of the actual maintenance and operation of the canal.[59] Under the general laws of the United States applicable to the handling of funds of government agencies, tolls and other revenues were paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts, and all disbursements were covered by direct appropriations.[60] Exceptions to the general rule, permitting expenditure of canal revenues before being covered into the Treasury were covered by appropriations made by the Congress.

Thus, section 6 of the Panama Canal Act authorized the President, through the Panama Railroad Company or otherwise, to operate dry docks, repair shops, yards, docks, wharves, warehouses, storehouses and other necessary facilities and appurtenances, "in accordance with appropriations hereby authorized to be made from time to time by Congress as part of the maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal. Moneys received from the conduct of said business may be expended and reinvested for such purposes without being covered into the Treasury of the United States, and such moneys are hereby appropriated for such purposes, but all deposits of such funds shall be subject to the provisions of existing law relating to the deposit of other public funds of the United States, and any net profit accruing from such business shall annually be covered into the Treasury of the United States."[61]

Similar provisions were included in the Sunday Civil Appropriations Act, 1917, which also "appropriated out of any money hereafter received as tolls, before such money is covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts" amounts necessary to make refunds of tolls that were erroneously collected.[62]

After the Act of September 26, 1950, the agency previously known as The Panama Canal and renamed Canal Zone Government, continued to pay all revenues into the Treasury and receive direct appropriations to cover expenses of performance of its various duties in reference to the civil government of the Canal Zone.[63]

In the operation of the canal and related facilities, the Panama Canal Company is subject to the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act.[64] As noted above, under that Act, funds of the Company, which must be deposited into accounts with the Treasury or depository banks approved by the Secretary of the Treasury,[65] are made available for expenditure by appropriations enacted annually by the Congress, after consideration of a detailed budget program submitted to Congress by the President in the Annual Budget of the United States.[66]

B. Payments to Panama

Funds for the lump sum payment to Panama of $10 million provided for in Article XIV of the 1903 treaty were appropriated by Congress by the Act of April 28, 1904.[67] An appropriation of $250,000 to enable the Secretary of State to make the first annual payment to Panama, due February 28, 1913, was made in a deficiency appropriation act for that year.[68] Funds for the annual payments to Panama under the applicable treaties were thereafter regularly included in appropriation acts for the Department of State until a permanent appropriation was enacted for making the annual payments in the amounts specified by the 1903 and 1936 treaties ($430,000).[69] In 1955 the appropriation was increased to $1,930,000 to cover the corresponding increase in the payments provided by Article I of the 1955 treaty,[70] and subsequent appropriation acts have adjusted the amount of the annual payment to reflect the effect of the relationship of the dollar to the price of gold.[71] The current amount of the annual payment ($2,328,000) is shown as one of three permanent appropriations in the Department of State budget for fiscal year 1978.[72]

When Congress provided in 1950 for operation of the canal by the government corporation previously known as the Panama Railroad Company and renamed the Panama Canal Company, the corporation was required to reimburse the Treasury for the amount of the annual payments to Panama under Article XIV of the 1903 treaty as modified by Article VII of the 1936 treaty, then totalling $430,000 a year.[73] When the 1955 treaty increased the amount of the annuity payment to Panama to $1,930,000, a Senate amendment of the bill to implement the treaty that would have required the corporation to reimburse the Treasury for the amount of the increase was deleted in conference.[74] The amount of the annual payment to Panama reimbursed to the Treasury is one of the costs of operation of the canal recovered from user charges under the tolls formula enacted by Congress,[75] but the payment by the corporation is to the Treasury, not to Panama, and the total amount of the annual payment to Panama is covered by appropriations budgeted by the Department of State.

VI. PROPOSED PANAMA CANAL TREATY

A. Operation of the Panal Canal—The Panama Canal Commission:

Insofar as concerns the question of the compatibility of the provisions of the proposed Panama Canal treaty with the provisions of the constitution limiting to the Congress the power to make appropriations, the pertinent provisions of the proposed treaty include the following:

Article I of the proposed treaty [76] grants to the United States for the duration of the treaty, "the rights necessary to regulate the transit of ships through the Panama Canal, and to manage, operate, maintain, improve, protect and defend the canal." [77]

Under Article III of the treaty:

The United States "may" "establish, modify, collect and retain tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges, and establish and modify methods of their assessment." [78]

The United States "shall, in accordance with the terms of this treaty and the provisions of United States law, carry out its responsibilities by means of a United States Government agency called the Panama Canal Commission, which shall be constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America." [79]

The Panama Canal Commission is to be supervised by a nine-member Board, the membership of which is to be comprised of five nationals of the United States and four nationals of Panama.[80]

The United States is to employ a national of the United States as Administrator of the Commission and a Panamanian national as Deputy Administrator through December, 1989. After that date the Administrator is to be a Panamanian and the Deputy Administrator a United States national.[81]

On the effective date of the treaty, "the United States Government agencies known as the Panama Canal Company and the Canal Zone Government shall cease to operate within the territory of the Republic of Panama that formerly constituted the Canal Zone." [82]

Other than to specify the name of the agency to be established to operate the canal, and to provide for Panamanian participation in the supervisory Board and appointment of a national of Panama, first as the Deputy Administrator and later as Administrator, the treaty leaves the form of the agency and the description of its powers entirely to the laws of the United States.

The laws of the United States governing the funding and fiscal obligations of government agencies generally are summarized in Part IV of this memorandum, and the application of those laws to the various agencies presently involved in the administration of the Panama Canal is described in Part V.

B. Payments to Panama

Article III of the treaty provides that "the Panama Canal Commission shall reimburse the Republic of Panama" in the amount of $10 million per annum for certain described services in canal operating areas and housing areas presently provided in the Canal Zone by the Panama Canal Company and Canal Zone Government. Provision is made for adjustment of the amount of the payment in three years for inflation and "other relevant factors affecting the cost of such services." [83]

Article XIII of the treaty provides that:

The United States of America transfers, without charge, to the Republic of Panama all right, title, and interest the United States of America may have with respect to all real property, including non-removable improvements in the present Canal Zone, on a time schedule set out in the Article.[84]

The Republic of Panama shall receive "from the Panama Canal Commission" a return on the national resources dedicated to the operation of the canal in the form of three categories of annual payments: [85]

a. "An annual amount to be paid out of Canal operating revenues" computed at the rate of 30¢ per Panama Canal net ton, or its equivalency, for each vessel transiting the canal after entry into force of the treaty for which tolls are charged;

b. A fixed annuity of $10 million to be paid "out of Canal operating revenues" and to "constitute a fixed expense of the Panama Canal Commission."

c. An additional annual amount of $10 million "to be paid out of Canal operating revenues" to the extent such revenues exceed expenditures with a provision for carry over of unpaid balances of this payment to future years.

C. Effect of Treaty Provisions for Payment to Panama

Nothing in the language of the proposed treaty serves to take the stipulated payments to Panama out of the accepted principle that a treaty providing for the payment of money is not self-executing but, under the Constitution, requires appropriations by the Congress. In the 1903 treaty, the United States agreed to pay to Panama a lump sum of $10 million and annual payments of $250,000. Appropriations were required and have been obtained for all such payments.

The prescription of the proposed new treaty that the payments to Panama are to be made by the Panama Canal Commission appears to be without significance in this context. The Commission is the agency of the United States that the treaty provides will be "constituted by and in conformity with the laws of the United States of America" by means of which "the United States of America shall, in accordance with the terms of this treaty and the provisions of United States law" carry out its responsibilities under the treaty. The responsibilities are clearly those of the United States as a party to the treaty and as principal of the agency to be established under United States law. Presumably it would not be seriously contended that the effect of the constitutional provision limiting to the Congress the power to make appropriations can be circumvented by the device of providing in the treaty that a payment without appropriations is to be made by a named government agency instead of by the United States.

Footnotes at end of article.

The purpose of the addition in Article XIII of the treaty of the language that the payments provided in that article are to be made by the Commission "out of canal operating revenues" is not immediately apparent. The "canal operating revenues" referred to are presumably the "tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and other charges" which the United States (not the Panama Canal Commission) is authorized to "Establish, modify, collect and retain" by Article III, section 2 (c) of the treaty. These revenues are the same in kind as those that have been derived by the United States from the Panama Canal since it was opened to commerce and which have been expended pursuant to appropriations by the Congress since that time.

It may be that the objective of the provision of the treaty for making the payments "out of canal operating revenues" was to identify such payments as part of the cost of operation for purposes of establishing rates of tolls. Such a construction necessarily assumes that revenues will be sufficient to cover both the payments to Panama and operating expenses other than such payments and leaves unanswered the obvious question of the results of a disparity between the amount of revenues and the total of such expenses—is such a deficiency to be absorbed by the United States Government by appropriations to cover losses, or by Panama through acceptance of less than the amount of the payments stipulated by the treaty? In either case, the provision for payment out of revenues does not appear to affect the constitutional requirement for appropriations to carry the provisions into effect.

The provision of section 4(c) of Article XIII for payment of $10 million "out of canal operating revenues to the extent that such revenues exceed expenditures of the Panama Canal Commission" bears some resemblance to the present provision of law requiring the agency operating the canal to pay into the United States Treasury annually in reduction of the investment of the United States in the canal, such funds of the agency as are in excess of requirements for working capital and forseeable plant replacements and expansion.[87]

Viewed in that light the provisions of section 4(c) of Article XIII would substitute Panama for the United States as the beneficiary of funds in excess of those required for operating and capital expenses, and effectively precludes further reduction of the U.S. Government's investment in the canal. This, of course, would represent a substantial departure from one of the present laws governing operation of the canal; a matter left by the treaty to the discretion of Congress.[88] In any event, like the provision of Article XIII for annual payments based on the aggregate measurement tonnage of ships using the canal during the year, the qualification introduced by section 4(c) relates to the determination of the amount of the payment, not to the necessity for Congressional appropriations to authorize payment.

The provisions of Article XIII of the treaty for payments to Panama "out of Canal operating revenues" also invite comparison with the provisions of the various acts of Congress referred to above appropriating or making available for expenditure revenues of the Panama Canal without such revenues having been covered into the Treasury. Viewed in that light, the payment provisions would represent an attempt to provide permanent appropriations for the treaty payments, an objective clearly precluded by the constitutional limitation to the Congress of the power to make appropriations.

Finally, it is not considered that the provision of Article XIII section 4(a) for calculation of the payment to Panama to be made annually under that section affects the constitutional requirement that treaty provisions for payment of money be carried into effect by Congressional appropriations. That section provides for payment of an annual amount computed at the rate of $.30 per Panama Canal net ton, "or its equivalency" for each vessel transiting the canal for which tolls are charged. The rate of $.30 per Panama Canal net ton "or its equivalency" is to be adjusted periodically for changes in the wholesale price index.

The obvious difference between the payment provided in this section and the annual payments originally provided in the 1903 treaty and modified by the 1936 and 1955 treaties, is that the latter established a fixed sum while section 4(a) of the new treaty provides for a variable annual payment depending on the measurement tonnage of ships paying tolls for use of the canal. Apart from an inherent ambiguity as to the meaning and effect of the phrase "or its equivalency" as used in the section, the required computation is a straight-forward arithmetical calculation. The provision for adjustment of the rate per ton used in the calculation to reflect changes in the wholesale price index is new only in the standard applied for the adjustment; annual payments under the existing treaties are adjusted for fluctuations in the price of gold in relation to the dollar. In any event, there is no basis for concluding that the provisions of section 4(a) for calculation of the payment or adjustment of the rate used in the calculation obviate the necessity for appropriations as required for the payments under the existing treaties.

In an early opinion upholding the constitutional validity of a treaty providing for the issuance (but not the payment) of bonds to an Indian tribe, the Attorney General correctly stated the rule applicable to the payments provided by the proposed treaty as follows:

"According to Article I, section 9, of the Constitution, as construed by the practice of the Government, an Act of Congress is necessary to appropriate money to pay the public debt, however created. The change of the form of the debt from a general stipulation in the treaty to bonds with a particular provision does not take away that necessity." [89]

Mr. HELMS. I thank the able Senator from Utah for yielding to me.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, what is the time situation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has 1 minute; the Senator from Maryland has 5 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, the other day we considered an amendment which proposed to include in the text of the treaty a subject which could be handled by statute here in Congress, because it dealt with a matter entirely within our jurisdiction. I rose to oppose that amendment, because I take the view that on those matters where we retain jurisdiction and can change by statute we should not place such matters into a treaty with another country. To do so would mean that we could only change the provisions concerning the matter by treaty change when, in fact, it is a matter that is within our jurisdiction and with which we can deal by statute.

The subject matter of the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Utah is exactly such a subject matter. As I indicated the other day, it is my intention to take this approach toward amendments which may be offered which seek to take a subject matter, over which we can exercise control by statute, and to place it in a treaty we are making with another country.

Why should we do that if we are really concerned about maintaining the maximum amount of control in our own hands? Why should we lose the control we have, through the use of statute, over a particular subject matter by placing the subject matter in a treaty? As long as we retain statutory control, we can do it in a particular way that serves our purposes and if we evolve a different way for doing it, we can change the manner of doing it. We can add a requirement from time to time. We can eliminate a requirement from time to time.

When we have that kind of control, why should we take the subject matter, put it into a treaty with another nation, and thereby give that other nation some degree of control over a matter that is otherwise completely within our own discretion?

I submit that that approach defies logic, defies commonsense and most important of all runs counter to what is in our best interests.

I am not contending that the substance of the suggested amendment as to how to handle the matter may not in fact be the best way to do it. The point I am making is that it is a subject matter that we can deal with by legislation. Given that this is the case we ought not to take the subject matter and make it part of the treaty. This would mean that if we want to change how we deal with the subject we can only accomplish that change by an amendment to the treaty which, of course, then involves another nation. We have a subject matter here that does not have to be included in the treaty and therefore we do not have to bind ourselves to deal with it by treaty. It is open to us, to Congress, to the United States, to make its own determinations as to how this subject matter should be dealt with.

Given that this is the case, it seems to me prudent and sensible to maintain in our own hands the maximum amount of discretion and control over this subject matter. The way to do that is not to place it into the treaty which then means that the other nation with whom we have the treaty would thereafter be involved in determining how that subject matter should be dealt with.

Not only is that not necessary here, but in fact to include it in the treaty is to place limitations upon our own power to deal with this subject matter. We may well want to deal with it in the way that the Senator from Utah has suggested in the amendment. But we may want to deal with it that way over a period of time and at some future time as different procedures or concepts evolve we may want to change how we deal with it. As long as we do not lock it into the treaty, we have the power, the control, and the discretion to make such changes.

If you take a subject matter that is entirely within our own purview and put it into the treaty, then you needlessly and unwisely give another nation a role to play, and I just do not think we should do that. I do not think we need to do that. We do not need to lose something in terms of our own control and jurisdiction over the subject matter. For that reason I oppose the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired. The Senator from Utah has 1 minute.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, that is the very reason we would like to have it dealt with in the treaty because we would like to deal with it legislatively, but the implementing legislation indicates that it is not going to do that. If the subject can be dealt with by legislation, why is it that the implementing legislation clearly indicates that the substance of my amendment will not be followed? Therefore, we want the Constitution to be abided by. The best way to do it is by this amendment. It does not hurt the Panamanians in any way, and it corrects an obvious defect in the treaties and in the implementing legislation.

So I recommend that my colleagues vote for this amendment, because it is a worthwhile amendment and one worthy of their consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Utah has expired.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment of the Senator from Utah and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, on this vote I have a live pair with the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.). If he were present and voting he would vote "nay." I have already voted "yea." I, therefore, withdraw my vote.

Mr. BAKER (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, on this vote I have a live pair with the distinguished Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND). If he were present and voting he would vote "nay." I have voted "yea." I, therefore, withdraw my vote.

Mr. FORD (after having voted in the negative). Mr. President, on this vote I have a live pair with the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS). If he were here and voting he would vote "yea." I have voted "nay." I, therefore, withdraw my vote.

(Mr. MATSUNAGA assumed the chair.)

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MCGOVERN), the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.), and the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE) are necessarily absent.

On this vote, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) is paired with the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI). If present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota would vote "yea" and the Senator from Arizona would vote "nay."

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BARTLETT), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE), the Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH), the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), and the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. THURMOND) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 29, as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEINZ. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Alabama is to be recognized. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN) is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, may I inquire of the distinguished Senator from Alabama, the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, and the distinguished Senator from Nevada as to whether or not there are any further amendments to article III? I do not believe there are. If that is the case, we could move on to article IV, Mr. HELMS could lay down an amendment tonight to article IV, and we can get an agreement on it, I believe—if Mr. SARBANES is agreeable, Mr. HELMS is—to allow 1 hour on that amendment, to be equally divided, the time to begin tomorrow.

Mr. LAXALT. Mr. President, apparently all proposed amendments to article III of the treaty have not been disposed of. The Senator from Nevada (Mr. CANNON) indicated earlier that he might want to process his amendment this evening, but he has left the Chamber. If we could have moment to contact his office and verify that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The Chair is unable to hear what Senators are saying.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I wonder if we could move on to article IV.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please suspend until the Senate is in order.

The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Could we move on to article IV, subject to allowing Mr. CANNON to call up an amendment to article III tomorrow?

Any Senator can do that if he wants to, in any event.

Mr. LAXALT. That would be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. While we are still in session this afternoon, and there are a few Members on the floor, I would like to take this opportunity to commend our majority leader. It has been brought to the attention of our colleagues several times here that at one time he was opposed to the Panama Canal Treaty.

Now, I am a rather stubborn individual, and I am known for sticking to my ideas; but I think I would be crazy if I did not change my mind once in a while.

So I rise at this time in defense of a man who has seen fit to change his mind. I think, as one famous old Senator said—oh, I forget what he said, but it was pretty good thinking [laughter]—something about consistency being the hobgoblin of little minds.

So I want to defend my leader. Although I wish he had not changed his mind, I defend him for doing it, and always will.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I have been asked the question twice as to why I had changed my mind, and I spread the reasons on the record, and I have been glad to do so. In fact, I have thought on one or two occasions I would slip a note to the Senator who has the floor and ask him to ask me why I changed my mind, so I could spread it on the record; and I have been able to do that twice.

But I am glad there are Senators on the floor who will rise to my defense, because I need that kind of defense. I know I can depend on the distinguished Senator from Arizona always to be fair, just, and reasonable, as he has just demonstrated once again.

Mr. President, could we move on to article IV?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no further amendments to article III, the clerk will read article IV.

ARTICLE IV

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Article IV, Protection and Defense.

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama commit themselves to protect and defend the Panama Canal. Each Party shall act, in accordance with its constitutional processes—

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the article be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Article IV is as follows:

ARTICLE IV

PROTECTION AND DEFENSE

1. The United States of America and the Republic of Panama commit themselves to protect and defend the Panama Canal. Each Party shall act, in accordance with its constitutional processes, to meet the danger resulting from an armed attack or other actions which threaten the security of the Panama Canal or of ships transiting it.

2. For the duration of this Treaty, the United States of America shall have primary responsibility to protect and defend the Canal. The rights of the United States of America to station, train, and move military forces within the Republic of Panama are described in the Agreement in Implementation of this Article, signed this date. The use of areas and installations and the legal status of the armed forces of the United States of America in the Republic of Panama shall be governed by the aforesaid Agreement.

3. In order to facilitate the participation and cooperation of the armed forces of both Parties in the protection and defense of the Canal, the United States of America and the Republic of Panama shall establish a Combined Board comprised of an equal number of senior military representatives of each Party. These representatives shall be charged by their respective governments with consulting and cooperating on all matters pertaining to the protection and defense of the Canal, and with planning for actions to be taken in concert for that purpose. Such combined protection and defense arrangements shall not inhibit the identity or lines of authority of the armed forces of the United States of America or the Republic of Panama. The Combined Board shall provide for coordination and cooperation concerning such matters as:

(a) The preparation of contingency plans for the protection and defense of the Canal based upon the cooperative efforts of the armed forces of both Parties;

(b) The planning and conduct of combined military exercises; and

(c) The conduct of United States and Panamanian military operations with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal.

4. The Combined Board shall, at five-year intervals throughout the duration of this Treaty, review the resources being made available by the two Parties for the protection and defense of the Canal. Also, the Combined Board shall make appropriate recommendations to the two Governments respecting projected requirements, the efficient utilization of available resources of the two Parties, and other matters of mutual interest with respect to the protection and defense of the Canal.

5. To the extent possible consistent with its primary responsibility for the protection and defense of the Panama Canal, the United States of America will endeavor to maintain its armed forces in the Republic of Panama in normal times at a level not in excess of that of the armed forces of the United States of America in the territory of the former Canal Zone immediately prior to the entry into force of this Treaty.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL) having expressed a wish to respond to certain of my comments, I would like, subject to yielding first to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, to ask that the Senator from Alaska be permitted to speak for 15 minutes, and that I then be recognized again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield first to the Senator from North Carolina.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 19

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I simply wanted to send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

Mr. ALLEN. I had also promised to yield to the Senator from Arkansas for 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator from North Carolina now offering his amendment?

Mr. HELMS. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Before the first sentence of paragraph 2 of article IV, insert the subparagraph designation "(a)".

"(b)(1) When in the performance of official duties, the vessels and aircraft operated by or for the United States Forces may move freely through Panamanian air space and waters without impediment.

"(2) Similarly, the vehicles, equipment, and personnel of the United States Forces may, when in the performance of official duties, move freely in the Republic of Panama without impediment.".

Mr. HELMS. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be laid aside, in accordance with the unanimous-consent request propounded by the distinguished majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, could we get a unanimous consent that there will be a 1-hour time limitation on the amendment to begin running tomorrow when the Senate resumes its consideration of the treaty, to be equally divided in accordance with the usual form?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator from Alabama and I thank the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield 4 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas (Mr. HODGES), as in legislative session, and to then yield to the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized for 4 minutes, as in legislative session.

SENATOR JOHN L. McCLELLAN

Mr. HODGES. Mr. President, last Tuesday I was given the high honor of being asked to give the dedicatory address at the dedication of McClellan Hall, Arkadelphia, Ark. My comments at that dedication dealt with what I thought of the late Senator McClellan and the role he played in the U.S. Senate.

I have been asked by a number of people to include those remarks in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that those remarks be printed in their entirety in the RECORD, and, if it is possible to include them in whatever remembrances are gathered together and published with other remarks in the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR KANEASTER HODGES, JR.

Mrs. McClellan, Dr. Grant, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen: I have in hand a copy of a letter, dated March 11, 1938. It is styled at the top "John L. McClellan, Candidate for United States Senator, Temporary Headquarters Malvern, Arkansas." It is addressed to W. M. Shelby, an old friend, and it is from 42-year old John L. McClellan, Congressman from the Sixth District of Arkansas. Mr. Shelby's daughter lives in Newport now, and has the original. In a column on the left side of the letter, as was the custom in those days, is a recounting of the approximately first one-half of John McClellan's life. It starts off at the top by saying "The son of a tenant farmer at birth" and continues on to indicate that he was licensed to practice law when 17 years of age, becoming the youngest lawyer in the United States. At 21 served as a lieutenant in the Army in the World War; elected city attorney of Malvern at 24; elected prosecuting attorney of the Seventh District of Arkansas at 30; elected to Congress from the Sixth District of Arkansas at the age of 38; and then it concludes by saying "Now, at the age of 42, on the way to the United States Senate."

The letter itself gives insight into the man who was John McClellan. The first paragraph concludes with John McClellan telling Mr. Shelby to relax and enjoy his vacation. He goes on to say "I know how difficult it is to do this, because I am miserable when I am not working." The second paragraph begins with this statement, "I am fully confident of victory." It concludes by saying, "When elected, I shall undertake to make the State of Arkansas a senator the people can be proud of." We see in this letter then some of the essential hallmarks of the life of John L. McClellan: the love of work, especially public service; his confidence in final victory; his love of Arkansas; and his desire to work for the State of Arkansas and to make it a senator of which it could be proud.

It is ironic that also at the top of the stationery is found the picture of a large blue ribbon, which has across it "A Winner." As we know, he did not win that race. It was to be four years later before he could claim the victory and a seat in the United States Senate. It must have been a dark and depressing time for him. But as he was to do time and again, in the face of the vilest vicissitudes of life, John McClellan did not merely survive—time and time again he prevailed.

The tough metal which was John Little McClellan was forged in a plain rural home, hammered out in hard times, and tested time and again politically and personally; by presidents, by Jimmy Hoffa, by McCarthyism, by the TFX Scandal and by personal losses—and he was not found wanting in any of these.

But I am equally impressed by other things: by how he treated the little man; Jim in the Senate gym, who told me fondly of his $1 football bets with the Senator and how he misses him. Or the chauffeur of the Senate limousine, who was so sad at his friend's death, having regularly driven him, commenting on the many kindnesses of John McClellan. The question the Senator would ask about U.S. Attorney prospects—Does the man have the courage to prosecute the rich and the powerful?

There were the dramatic projects; the Arkansas River Navigation is one. But so too we should recall the countless thousands of individuals he helped: Social Security, pensions, academy appointments, veterans, local projects—so many in those 35 years. So long as our people honor those who have labored long and well in the vineyards of public service, John L. McClellan's name will be remembered with love, gratitude and reverence.

Does this mean there were no faults? No mistakes? No errors of judgment? Of course not. Must one share the political philosophy of John L. McClellan to honor him and recognize his achievement? Of course not!

His record in the United States Senate was outstanding. His impact on our state obvious. His contributions to the nation among those of any senator.

It was William Penn who said, "They have a right to censure who have a heart to help." John L. McClellan feared no man or principality, but he always had a heart to help also.

We are here today to dedicate this building, which with the favor of God and the labor of man has been completed. It embodies the wisdom of one man and his political generation, and it will impart its treasures of wisdom and knowledge to all who follow and study. We never fully learn the lessons of history, but with the use of Senator McClellan's papers perhaps we will not forget those lessons either.

It is my hope this hall will expand and grow, for this dedication is in vain without a re-dedication to the deep public service of John L. McClellan. His reputation for honesty, integrity and service will be alive in the hearts of people of good will and freedom longer than this building will stand. He was, and is, a man of that stature.

Who would have guessed, when John McClellan wrote that letter on March 11, 1938, of the great service he was yet to render—the tumultous decades ahead—that he would be a friend of presidents, serve 35 years in the United States Senate, his name become a household word, eventually to be chairman of the powerful Appropriations Committee. "The son of a tenant farmer at birth"—he came a long way, but he brought with him in the coming his common sense and common touch.

His death was the end of an era in Arkansas and part of the twilight of a Senate era—the powerful and effective committee Chairman from the South.

One can almost hear the bittersweet irony of the Gaelic toast: "Here's to us, and those like us, of which there are few, and they are all dead."

Except John Little McClellan shall live; in his papers, in these exhibits, in memories, in his good works.

The American dream that John L. McClellan lived out to its fullest is indeed alive and well, here in McClellan Hall, Ouachita Baptist University, Arkadelphia, Arkansas.

This day indeed we celebrate a rising sun—we thank God for those who gave this hall to preserve and perpetuate his work, we thank God for the life of John Little McClellan.

He was, and is, as that first stationery so stated, "A Winner."

BILL RUDDELL

Mr. HODGES. Mr. President, Bill Ruddell, a longtime close personal friend of mine, is the outstanding president of the White River Production Credit Association, which has its principal office in Newport, Ark., and is one of the largest, most efficient, and financially sound of the Production Credit Associations of this Nation.

He is a noted leader in his community, a leader in the church, an outstanding father and husband, as well as being of the highest reputation in the business community.

I was honored to speak at the annual meeting of the White River Production Credit Association in January of this year, where my remarks were preceded by a speech by Mr. Ruddell. His speech was in response to the severe financial crisis in agriculture today, and comes out of more than 28 years experience in agricultural financing. I strongly recommend to all who are interested in resolving the problems of agriculture that they read his remarks, which are sound, down-to-earth and have a practical application.

I ask unanimous consent that his speech be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH BY MR. RUDDELL

This concludes my financial report. I have briefed it, for it is printed in your program for you to study as time permits when you get home. I assure that your association at present is in good financial condition.

Usually following the financial report I give a brief management report on operations or credit, but today in lieu of such a report I have put together excerpts from a recently published agriculture history. I think this will serve a purpose better than a cold, statistical management report on credit or operational procedure, and your board chairman has already discussed some operational procedure and credit with you.

I feel that a review of this brief agricultural history will piece together and clarify some of the things we have forgotten which have carried us to our ailing agriculture situation which is crying out with its problems today. I feel these excerpts can remind us of what has perhaps brought agriculture to its present predicament, and perhaps has contributed to our nation's increase in city slums and poverty which has to be supported by food stamps.

There is a saying, "You can stand so close to the forest you cannot see the trees." This is perhaps what has happened to us—we have been moving too fast to rationalize our situation.

I want to share with you some of the personal things I have observed during my twenty-eight years in agriculture financing. I hope as you listen, you too, can relate them to some of our present agriculture problems we are facing today.

During the years following World War II, American agriculture's thrust toward bigness took on a new momentum. Fueled by cheap gasoline, by the new machines new technology, and by the endless quest for greater profits, expansion surged forward. With astonishing rapidity, the 60-horsepower general-purpose tractor was replaced by a new 130-horsepower model, then by a towering 235-horsepower machinery with a $40,000 price tag. The single-row harvester gave place to combines that could handle four rows simultaneously, then eight rows. The cost of such new equipment made it economically imperative for farmers to take on more acreage. Between 1950 and 1975 the acreage of the average American farm doubled and the value of farm machinery trebled.

Those who could not keep up with the frenzied pace were shoved aside and forced to drop out. In the new agriculture that was taking shape, there was no room for the "average" operator who simply wished to live on the land, work the soil and sell enough products to pay his bills, and generally, farmers found themselves underpriced and cut out of the market by the supermarket chains and agri-business corporations. In 1950, there were over 5.5 million farms in the country. By 1975 half of these farms had been consolidated out of existence. It was all part of the life-and-death struggle that one farm spokesman called "the survival of the fit."

In the past two decades millions of farm families have left the land for the cities and the suburbs. And with them have come millions of farm workes and millions of small-town residents. At present, 73 per cent of our population is crowded onto less than 2 percent of our land.

The movement in the United States toward bigger and fewer farms has received substantial assistance from government policies and programs for government research, and this research has been conducted at agricultural colleges and experiment stations. While Congress has appropriated hundreds of billions of dollars for American agriculture during the course of the last few decades, this research and costly technology has benefited only the affluent farmers, or the nation's agri-businesses.

The interests of average producers and non-commercial farmers have been given only minimal attention. The goal of public policy has been to create an expanding, industrialized system for production of poultry, beef and hogs, and elaborate machinery for the application of fertilizer, insecticides and herbicides and mechanical equipment of assorted crops and agriculture. Human considerations have been of little or no importance. Not only has this high priced equipment completely failed to meet the majority of the nation's farmers needs, but in most cases has posed a serious threat to their survival. In the last decades millions of farm families have been forced off the land and into cities, but this vast exodus from the countryside has been viewed by the U.S. Department of Agriculture with complacency and indifference. In fact, some agricultural leaders and policymakers have looked upon the loss of farm population as actually beneficial. In 1960, the future Secretary of Agriculture wrote in the USDA Yearbook: "The declining trend in farm population is itself a sign of a strong agriculture. . . . We will need fewer farmers in the future, but they must be better. They will be operating on a fast track and the race will go to the swift." He did a wonderful job by maintaining open exports and developing foreign markets, but having an agri-business background did not realize where average agriculture was going. Six years later a USDA report stated, "Our rural population is becoming largely a non-farm one. By 1980 only one rural resident in seven or eight may live on a farm. It is generally agreed that it is neither socially desirable nor economically feasible to try to arrest or even slow down this trend." And although not said, it was understood then that the exodus would be toward the city-unemployment and welfare.

In 1972, the USDA report stated: "Agricultural policy should be directed towards maintaining agriculture as a viable industry and not as a way of life. The number of farms, or the farm population is irrelevant except as these influence performance of the agricultural industry." This was someone writing them off, but at what a price to the nation—what eventual costs—high cost foods, high cost land and a controlled agriculture by big corporations.

Views such as these have in large part shaped our national agricultural policies—policies that have seriously neglected the interest of general farmers and have substantially accelerated the nation's trend toward larger and fewer farms, and if continued, will absorb all in its wake, regardless of present size.

The needs of the great majority of farmers have been ignored by research institutions and virtually no money or effort has been directed toward the development of economical, small-scale technology. The high costs of this developed technology has created the heavy national agricultural debt load burden, now well over $100 billion. This technology did not research price or returns needed to cover investments, and is leading to disaster to some now, but all later, and the nation in the end. The third president of the United States, Mr. Jefferson, warned against this trend nearly two hundred years ago.

Thus, all the high priced equipment has completely failed to meet the needs of the majority of the nations farmers, and as I stated, in many cases the development of such technology has posed a serious threat to their survival. Average farmers have found themselves unable to compete with high powered equipment and again, I repeat, that the average farmers have found themselves caught up in these excess capital costs and are sinking ever more deeply into debt in order to obtain the new machinery that will, if continued, only widen the debt-income ratio.

In 1969 one USDA official candidly admitted that, for the majority of farmers, government research had probably done more harm than good. He stated that the farmers had "been on the treadmill of technological change so long that they are frustrated about the past and present, and apprehensive of the future . . . They accept the new technology as a requirement for survival . . . The purchase of new machinery and the adoption of new practices often force them to overcapitalize their operations, bleed their assets and mortgage their future returns. . . . When we ask what agricultural research has done for this, the answer comes back: 'Very Little' . . . We have narrowed their choices to two: either get with the new production efficiency technology as we are developing it, or get out of the farming business."

Modern American agriculture prides itself above all upon its superabundant productivity and superlative efficiency. In 1975, a leading Department of Agriculture official declared: "I want to salute the world's greatest food system: A system of wondrous efficiency which is the envy of the world. A system whose innovations continue to point the way and serve as models for every other food system on our globe. . . . One American farm worker today supplies enough food and fiber for 56 people . . . Agricultural output last year was twice what it was 20 years ago."

In 1970, the Secretary of Agriculture stated: "Using a modern feeding system for broilers, one man can now take care of 60,000 to 75,000 chickens. One man in a modern feedlot can handle upwards of 5000 head of cattle. One man, with a mechanical system, can operate a dairy enterprise of 50 to 60 milk cows." In 1972, The American Farmer noted, "A new asparagus harvester can take care of 6 acres per hour, doing the work of 400 hand laborers."[1]

[1] All operated as big agri-businesses—all vulnerable to disease control & death loss, excess capital, use of larger & larger sources of anti-biotics & poison until consumption is, or may become, dangerous—Stronger and stronger herbicides until the soil is no longer viable and many other dangers too numerous to mention—all highly vulnerable to finance for lender and borrower.

The sheer output of modern American agriculture is, without question, stupendous. Yet in order to measure the true efficiency of any system of farming, it is necessary to consider inputs as well as outputs. And the inputs of American agriculture are massive.

At present, agriculture consumes more petroleum than any other of the nation's industries. In 1975, one Harvard scientist stated, "The total energy consumed by U.S. agriculture per year is equivalent to more than 30 billion gallons of gasoline. This represents more than five times the energy content of the food produced. Petroleum is used not only by the machines that plant, cultivate, spray, and harvest the nation's crops, but also in the production of fertilizers, insecticides and herbicides. Additional petroleum is used in the manufacture of farm equipment, in the production of electricity used on the farm, in irrigation, transportation, and processing. Agricultural economists who have totaled up these various energy inputs of the nation's agriculture have found that when taken together, the energy that goes into making our food is actually more than the energy contained within the food itself. According to some calculations, American agriculture now expends over five calories of energy in the form of fossil fuel in order to get one calorie of food to the consumer.

The Department of Agriculture tells us that, in the last twenty years, farm production has doubled. Yet it is also true that energy inputs during this period have rapidly increased. Between 1950 and 1970, the amount of fertilizer used in the production of the country's corn crop rose by eight times, the amount of insecticides by ten times, and the amount of herbicides by twenty times. One group of Cornell scientists who have painstakingly tabulated the inputs and outputs of the nation's corn crop during the last few decades have come to the conclusion that the American farmer produced corn 25 per cent more efficiently in 1945 than in 1970. Rather than become more efficient, United States agriculture, according to these experts, has become increasingly inefficient.

I feel there is a parallel between our accelerated, government-supported technology whose urgency was to industralize agriculture too rapidly, resulting in too rapid expansion of high cost capital, all coupled with excessive, accelerated operating or input costs, dependent likewise upon an accelerated, increased price that has not occurred, in relation to the invested excess capital and accelerated operating expense. The designers of the accelerated technology forgot to plan for accelerated price, resulting in lack of profit and in operating loss which so many of you have fought and attempted to compensate by increasing debts on real estate to get income to replace your operating loss, or sometimes selling assets, resulting continuously in erosion of net worth, all because of the fact that it was the only way you knew to stay alive and to continue in the only occupation you know and love.

I do not ask, or expect, that all in this room agree with this, but I remind one and all that whether you agree or not, without an increased price now to compensate the present dilemma, there is no solution to our present agriculture situation, for agriculture is too far in debt ($120 billion, and $18 billion income—nearly a 7 to 1 debt ratio). Any lender will tell you that a loan is lost or cannot be made with such ratio, for the borrower is broke.

I hesitate to make any additional remarks, but if we are to solve our present problems, we must be fair and honest in facing those problems. Such must be solved, for as agriculture goes, so goes America. If many, like the farmers now, had hollowed in 1924, there might not have been a 1929 and the 30's. If these remarks are too strong, or disagreeable, I apologize, but they still remain facts, not fiction, for I can attest to debt loads; the erosion of assets; and decline in net worth. This cannot continue, nor will it go away. The cost-price squeeze must be solved, or an industry will surely die, and if agriculture should die, with it being the base of our economy (which even now some disbelieve), other industry will also die with it, and so the national economy; thus, the problem lies not just with the farmer, but with the whole nation.

This concludes my remarks.

Thank you.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The Senate continued consideration of the treaty.

Mr. GRAVEL. Mr. President, first, I wish to express my gratitude to the Senator from Alabama. We could probably go on for more than 25 minutes. I wanted to interject my thoughts into this colloquy so it could be more evenly balanced.

The Chamber has fallen into silence. This is the first silence we have had today in the deafening cackle. I think that is the proper word, the deafening cackle that we have had. I think it is occasioned by reports coming out of Panama and the obvious disagreements which have appeared, or the fissures which may appear, within the proponents of the treaties which are before us.

I think it is most unfortunate that the Members of the Senate who are so close to these treaties would find relish in this because, as I stated earlier and I will state again, their joy is somewhat like the joy of an arsonist who has thrown a can of gasoline into a house. The house is burning down and they relish that. But what they relish even more is the fact that the firemen who are trying to put out the fire are having difficulties in coordinating their activities.

That they find relish in that I think is unfortunate, very unfortunate indeed, because if we have a dilemma before us today it is because of the opponents of the treaty who truly are opponents to change. The Senator from Alabama, I think for the first time, revealed truly one of his goals. That is, as he stated, to topple the Torrijos government and institute, as he sees it, a democracy.

I would first like to speak to that particular problem because, one, toppling of the Torrijos government, if that can be done from the Senate floor, would be very innovative, and, two, I do not think it is any guarantee that it would bring about democracy. I think we would be better advised, rather than to meddle tactically in domestic affairs of another country, to look to ourselves.

With respect to Mr. Torrijos, I do not think he needs any defense. I think the record should be made abundantly clear to the American people and to the people of Panama that he is the head of state and should receive the proper respect from Members of the Senate in the position he occupies.

I do not think there is a leader in this country who can claim that he has doubled the amount of schools in his tenure of office, and that is what Mr. Torrijos has done in Panama. That is quite an accomplishment. I do not think that has even been done in Alabama or in Alaska. Doubling the number of schools by a person is an unusual accomplishment because it is education and knowledge which is a touchstone of democracy. So if a foundation is being built for democracy, I submit that the present leader of Panama has made a contribution in that direction.

Also, if there is a reason why he has been abused so much by Members of the Senate, I think I know why. It is because he has put the United States of America to the test more than any other leader in the history of Panama. Every single leader of Panama since the 1903 treaty was signed has been trying to get that treaty changed. This is the first time that a leader of Panama has been able to get it to the floor of the Senate. He negotiated a treaty and did a good job.

If we respect and honor Jimmy Carter as the President of the United States and admire him for the courage he demonstrated in bringing the treaty to the Senate floor, then I think we owe the same respect to the gentleman who was on the other side of the negotiating table because it takes two to tango, and it takes two to bring us where we are.

So if this treaty is good, as I think it is, and I think many people throughout the Nation think it is good, then the credit should go, one, to Jimmy Carter and, two, to Omar Torrijos—equally, not one above the other.

I can understand some people who hold an archaic view of what the United States should be, who hold an archaic view of gunboat diplomacy in Panama. I can understand that, if they are made at the change of events or if they want to vent their anger. They want to vent that anger at the person who brought it thus far. So I do not say this by way of defense of anything that Mr. Torrijos has done, or his leadership. I stated it as a simple fact for any person to observe, and it would not take much of an observation to recognize that unusual accomplishment. That is what gets a lot of people mad on this floor, the fact that he has been able to realize the aspirations of his own people.

I think it is a bit of an exaggeration when my colleague from Alabama tells us that he is for the Panamanian people. If he is so much for the Panamanian people, then he ought to be for the treaty that the Panamanian people have overwhelmingly already approved.

When he says he wants another plebiscite in Panama, what he is saying is that he really wants to change that treaty so that there will have to be another plebiscite, a plebiscite that will turn it down.

I venture this thought: If there were a vote tomorrow in Panama on the Neutrality Treaty, based on what knowledge I have, if there were a plebiscite, it would be turned down, overwhelmingly.

As I stated earlier in the day, if I were a citizen of Panama and going to vote on this Neutrality Treaty in Panama, I would vote against it. I would clearly vote against it. It gives unbelievable rights to a foreign power over my sovreignty. If we had a labor dispute on the Panama Canal after the year 2000, the United States could unilaterally send in troops to correct the labor dispute. As I view it, a labor dispute in the United States is a very internal situation and a labor dispute in Panama is a very internal situation.

Let us now recapitulate as to how we got ourselves into the dilemma we have. First, let us look to the motivation of the proponents of the treaty on this side of the aisle, starting with the President of the United States. In my mind, Jimmy Carter has demonstrated courage and leadership of an unusual order. There is no question that his taking leadership on the Panamanian treaty to bring about a change that would create justice between ourselves and Panama was a very unusual act.

I think that there will be no personal benefit to him except in the retrospect of distant history. It was really an oddity that there should be such a view held, just prior to the vote on the first treaty, that we should vote for the treaty because it will make Jimmy Carter look bad in his leadership role if the treaty were turned down. I can assure you that Jimmy Carter will not look bad in anyone's eyes as history looks back upon what has taken place.

It would have been the Senate that would have looked bad had the treaty been turned down. That is who really would have been hurt, not Jimmy Carter. He did the best of his ability. He brought the treaty to us. If we turned it down, it would be the Senate that would have turned down the treaty, and Jimmy Carter would have done his work and we would have done our work. So I think his motivation is fine, honorable, and, in my mind, in the great tradition of this great country of ours.

Let us look at the motivation of the Senate leadership, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD. I think that here, again, he demonstrated equal courage, because I am sure that this is not a popular issue in his constituency, and he is one who can read his constituency very well. But, I think, he characterized his views with the Edmund Burke statement; that is, that he not only owes the people of his State, West Virginia, his industry, which he has given more than I could ever have thought possible; but he also owes the people of West Virginia his judgment. Oftentime, it takes courage to exercise that judgment.

The same thing is true of FRANK CHURCH. This is not a popular issue in the State of Idaho, any more than it is popular in the State of Alabama. So when a man stands up on this floor and is prepared to take his political life in his hands, that, I think, is meaningful, particularly when you know that he is talking from the bottom of his heart as to what is important.

Then to see Senator SARBANES stand on this floor, day in and day out, to provide leadership in this matter in a most skillful and able manner, also, I think, indicates courage, because the easy way out on this issue is to cop out to the demagoguery and to the false emotion that has pervaded this country. That is the easy way out. To my mind, to stand up and say what is right when there are no benefits in it for your constituency and yourself, that is what takes courage, and where great political damage could happen to yourself.

I stated a while back that had we had a secret vote on the treaties, the treaties would have passed a long time ago. What does that mean? That means the people in this Chamber know what is right and what is wrong. They know a change has to take place and if they could have voted secretly, they would have seen that a change would take place.

What happens in a democracy? By and large, the people of the country make cowards of the Senators. That is right; we are cowards. We are afraid of losing our jobs, so we cower to general public opinion, whether that public opinion is informed or not. We cower down.

So here we have a situation, because of the great sums of money that have been put up by the radical right, confusing the Nation with false information, in some cases outright lies; we have a situation where the proponents of a decent treaty have been pushed to the wall and, with their backs up against the wall, they made a normal human error. That is what I think is really the problem that has occurred today.

The human error was that the form became a little more important than the substance. In this case, I equate the form with the desire to pass a treaty. The substance is, is it a good treaty?

I was quite upset during the period that these amendments were accepted and were put on; not the DeConcini amendment. A lot of the other amendments were not worth the attention they got. "Cosmetic" is probably the kindest word I can use. They were put on so that we could have something that we could take back to the people and tell them, "Hey, I voted for the treaties, but, boy, I cleaned them up before I voted and it is OK now."

The issue is a very clear issue: Do we give back the canal to the people of Panama so we can continue using the canal? That is it. That is the issue. We can talk about defense and troops, and a lot of it is just eyewash.

The proponents of the treaty—and here, now, I mean the full gamut—we are all at fault. I for not speaking up when I thought better; General Torrijos for pushing too fast, with the inexperience of his first year, trying to push the Senate to get a decision on this. They were pushing to have a vote last September. They think they have problems now; just imagine what they would have been last September.

Then the leadership for agreeing to take the measure up and bring it to the Senate for a vote before they knew we had the votes. We did not know we had the votes until the last day. And we bought the last votes with the DeConcini amendment.

So the situation we have today is that we now have passed a treaty that is unacceptable to the Panamanian people.

Now we have an interesting dilemma. We see the error. We can slough over it. We can finesse it, which is obviously what we politicians generally attempt to do to avoid embarrassment.

What will happen? Well, the Panamanian people will turn down the treaty. So we can say that we in the Senate did our job and it is not our fault that the Panamanian people turned down the treaty.

Of course, we have heard this all day long, talking about the misunderstandings. That was no misunderstanding about the treaties that were brought to us. The misunderstanding is in this Chamber. That is where the misunderstanding is. The misunderstanding is what pushed the acceptance of the DeConcini amendment, which is not misunderstood in Panama. It is clearly understood in Panama and, from their point of view, it is not acceptable. It is an invasion of their sovereignty for perpetuity. I confess, as I read the English language, I view it exactly that way. It is an invasion of their sovereignty for perpetuity and they are not going to accept it.

So we are faced with this dilemma: We pass the treaties and they vote it down. Who is going to look bad in the court of world opinion? We Senators will stand up and pontificate and make speeches and tell them what a great job we did passing these treaties, and those terrible Panamanians did not have the gratitude to accept what we threw them.

Of course, with all the media in this country, we will come off well. Fortunately, the media in this country are beginning to mature. In fact, I might say the media on this subject have been very good all along.

Mr. ALLEN. Would the Senator repeat that?

Mr. GRAVEL. I think the media have been correct on this subject all along.

Mr. ALLEN. I am sure the Senator would think that, inasmuch as they have been drumming for the treaties all along. I can see how the Senator might think they are responsible. Of course, I have just the opposite view, I say to the distinguished Senator from Alaska.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is right. The reason I think the media are doing a good job right now is I share the same view they have.

That is not unusual, to have that view.

I would like to reinforce the record at this point and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post, a Time essay from Time magazine, and what I feel is a most perceptive piece by Haynes Johnson entitled "Trial" which appeared on April 9. I think all of those would reinforce the RECORD with repect to where we stand right now.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESERVATIONS ABOUT DECONCINI

The "DeConcini Reservation," which the Senate attached to the first Panama Canal treaty, is a ratty thing to behold. Imposed on a desperate (and careless) White House by Sen. Dennis DeConcini (D-Ariz.) as the price of his vote, it authorizes the United States on its own to use military force "in Panama" to keep the canal open and operating after the year 2000, when ostensibly Panama would be in full control. The "reservation" is arrogant. It mocks the intent to replace the dangerously obsolete terms of the 1903 treaty with a relationship respectful of a small country's sovereignty and pride. And it could yet kill the two Panama treaties.

Here is why: From the moment it was enacted, Mr. DeConcini's handiwork galled all Panamanians, regardless of their attitude toward the government or the new treaties. All other Latins, too, instantly understood that the language trod grossly on Latin America's traditional resentment and fear of American intervention. It can be argued that, regardless of treaty language, this country has the power to intervene in Panama, and would. But to state that, to rub Panama's nose publicly in the dirt, is intolerable. So it is no surprise that the Panamanians, passing beyond their initial, relatively subdued criticism of the reservation at home, are now soliciting international sympathy for their objections to it. Once international support for their position solidifies, as almost certainly it will—and why not?—they may openly reject the reservation and hope to face the United States down.

MYTHOLOGIZING THE PANAMA CANAL

Getting the first Panama Canal treaty through the Senate last month was roughly the equivalent of putting a big tanker through the waterway: there was no room to spare. The second treaty, providing for the gradual transfer of authority to Panama by the year 2000, is expected to have an equally narrow passage when it comes up for a vote on April 18. Opponents of the treaty have intensified their pressure on wavering Senators, and a defeat of the second treaty would force renegotiation of the entire agreement, with potentially explosive consequences. Seldom, in fact, has a project that is so clearly in the national interest faced such a desperate fight for approval.

The opposition to the treaty is a curious mixture of cynicism and conviction. After a period of many setbacks overseas, Americans have been in no mood to accept what seemed to be another reversal. Moreover, the canal is fixed in the popular imagination as a memorable achievement of American vigor and know-how. Why, people asked, should it be given away under any circumstances? There were reasonable answers to such a question, but they were not provided by the superpatriots of the hardcore right wing, who thought they had a sure-fire issue and promptly started to exploit it. Their lavishly financed propaganda barrage has often made a hash of the facts. Many people have been led to believe that the treaty constitutes some kind of massive giveaway that will leave the esteemed and still vital waterway in the clutches of rapacious crypto-Communists who will thereupon thumb their noses at the helpless giant to their north. Nothing could be further from the truth.

The pact profoundly commits the U.S. to the defense of the canal from here to eternity. Until 2000, the U.S. maintains control of the waterway; at the turn of the century, Panama takes over, but the U.S. has the right to keep the canal open and functioning. Indeed this provision has been strengthened because of the doubts among treaty opponents. Responding to their pressure, the White House accepted two reservations that clearly state that the U.S. can send troops into Panama to protect the canal if it is shut down for virtually any reason.

The treaty, in fact, gives the sanction of law to U.S. intervention if the need arises. This provision has been made so explicit by the reservations that Panama now has sent a letter to other Latin American nations suggesting that it may not be able to accept the treaty in its present form. Rather tolerant through all the tumultuous and sometimes insulting Senate debate, Panamanians have been pushed close to their limits; and there are, after all, two parties to the treaty.

The second Senate vote does not come at the best of times. The Soviet Union is rapidly building up its armaments and brazenly sending its Cuban allies into Africa to stir up trouble and challenge American interests. Many treaty supporters, including Senator Henry Jackson, are understandably concerned that a ceding of the canal may be interpreted as another American retreat. But the U.S. is hardly backing down from a Soviet threat; it is rising to the occasion of settling a dispute with an ally. If it is a sign of weakness to capitulate to an enemy, it may well be an indication of strength to make timely concessions to a friend.

Now, perhaps Gen. Omar Torrijos, the Panamanian leader, is feinting, or trying to win an international moral victory to cover Panama's humiliation. Or perhaps he is merely gathering international support to deter further hurtful amendments that the Senate may impose on the second treaty (covering the period up to 2000). It may yet turn out that Panama's crushing need for the new revenues promised by the treaties will induce the general to swallow his pride, brush aside his opposition and accept the administration's worried assurances that the reservation does not really alter the substance of the first treaty. It is not inconceivable that he will bow to the threats of Sen. Howard Baker (R-Tenn), who, incredibly, takes the position that since he, Howard Baker, has "really gone out on a limb for these treaties . . . our friends in Panama ought to know that just the twitch of an eyelid, just the slightest provocation or expression that these treaties, or this treaty in this form, is not acceptable to Panama, and this whole thing could go down the tube." By jingo, Mr. Baker, how could Panama dare to inconvenience your presidential aspirations?

Such are the stakes for both countries, however, that anyone wishing them well is reduced to foisting upon Panama an additional burden of compromise. Presumably, that is why President Carter, in the text of an interview released yesterday, said that "any statement, even if it is well-based, by the Panamanians that would cause consternation or doubt in the minds of U.S. senators could very well endanger the passage of the second treaty." We say with genuine regret that we do not see that the Panamanian government has a good alternative to learning to live with the DeConcini reservation. To carry its anger to the point of giving the Senate the pretext to turn tail on the treaties would be a disaster. In a fairer world, it would not be this way. The fact is that the United States lacks the maturity, and the administration the political prowess, to make things come out otherwise.

The shame of this approach is evident. If, however, Panama finally balks at accepting the American revision of the first treaty, or if the Senate piles more equally egregious amendments on the second, then it is clear where the principal responsibility for the resultant diplomatic catastrophe will lie. It will lie on uninformed, insensitive, posturing legislators like Dennis DeConcini and Howard Baker—men demonstrably blind to the requirements of treating other nations, even a small, close, friendly and strategically vital nation like Panama, with decency and respect.

TRIAL

(By Haynes Johnson)

In a week the Senate prepares to vote on the second, and final, of the Panama Canal treaties. The canal has stirred more words and less passion than any supposed major issue in memory. Most senators, and Americans undoubtedly want to be done with it. Certainly there are more critical questions. It's hardly surprising that passage of the second treaty was assured—until, that, is the last few days.

Now, we're told, the treaty package is in jeopardy. The problem, it's being said in Washington, lies with the Panamanians. At the last moment they are letting their concerns be known and raising the prospect that they may reject the treaties as amended and ratified by the Americans. Howard Baker, leader of the Republican pro-treaty forces in the Senate, has bluntly warned the Panamanians to cool it, or risk losing all.

"Any rocking of the boat," Baker said, "could put these treaties in extreme peril." If the Senate gets the idea Panama is dissatisfied, or if any action occurs either in street demonstrations or in protests at the United Nations—well, there goes the deal.

Spoken, appropriately, like a big brother to a wayward sibling. Keep quiet and smile, or else.

There is a problem with the treaties, but it doesn't lie with the Panamanians. As presently amended, the first of the treaties represents a negation of almost 50 years of bipartisan American foreign policy. It puts us back in the business of nakedly advocating intervention in the internal affairs of other nations, something history and a host of documents we've legally subscribed to presumably put to rest long ago.

Not that American practice has always lived up to American ideals. At times we have violated our own oaths and attempted to overthrow or subvert other Latin nations—Guatemala in the 1950s, the Bay of Pigs in the 1960s, Chile in the 1970s all are part of broken U.S. promises. But in each case our secret interventions caused serious international problems for America contributing to a tarnishing of the U.S. reputation for good faith abroad and to a lessening of belief in the government at home. Today, particularly, in the post-Vietnam, post-imperialist America when we are preaching the cause of human rights and supporting the rights of emerging nations, a U.S. endorsement of the principle of armed intervention defies belief.

This is an offensive doctrine. It will be a tragedy if allowed to stand. The test lies not with little Panama, but with us. It's not too much to suggest that American principles are on trial here, and that the Senate still can redeem them. The question is whether we act like a great power, assured of our strength and confident in our convictions, or like a petty, churlish state—whether, in short, we uphold what we have pledged to uphold.

And there the record of history is clear.

In the fulminations of the critics, Panama has been mythologized into a nation of peasants lusting to get their hands on the Canal Zone as soon as the U.S. relinguishes it. Panama in fact, contains a substantial, sophisticated, much-traveled business community with close ties to the U.S. Its leaders are just as determined as anyone to gain control of the waterway that divides their country in two. For them, it is a matter of national and indeed group pride. They feel they are perfectly capable of running the canal; it is a role for which they have been groomed in their dealings with the U.S. Approval of the treaty would probably strengthen their position in Panama, since the left wing would no longer be able to campaign effectively on a program to seize the canal. It is no accident that the opposition to the treaty is as intense among the left in Latin America as it is among the right in the U.S.

When treaty supporters make these facts known to their constituents, they find that opposition often melts away. As the issues have been clarified, the public has turned around in its opinion. Sentiment against the treaty is as strong in Arizona as anywhere in the nation, yet when Democratic Senator Dennis DeConcini went home over the Easter recess, he discovered that the "reaction was not nearly as hostile as I expected. I found pretty good acceptance." Since he had sponsored one of the two reservations sharpening the treaty's language, he could legitimately boast that he had improved the pact. When he got a phone call from Jimmy Carter in Nigeria asking for his vote on the second treaty, DeConcini replied that he would have a reservation or two to offer. Said the President: "My door is open."

Another last-minute convert to the treaty, Montana's Senator Paul Hatfield, ran into heavier flak among his constituents. He is particularly vulnerable because he was appointed to the Senate last January and is up for election in the fall. When a fellow Senator remarked to Hatfield's wife Dorothy Ann that her husband was at least getting a lot of publicity from his ordeal, she snapped, "So did the Los Angeles strangler." Nonetheless, Hatfield has learned that independence has its rewards. Elden Curtiss, the Roman Catholic Bishop of western Montana, publicly endorsed Hatfield's vote as "courageous." A bit belatedly, the President also called Hatfield from Nigeria to express his thanks for the vote that put the first treaty over.

Anxiety about the second vote raises anew the problem that confronted the great British Statesman Edmund Burke when he was elected to Parliament. In a speech to his Bristol constituents, he recognized that it was "his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfactions to theirs." But he went on to say: "Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays instead of serving you if he sacrifices it to your opinion." On grounds of judgment alone, the Panama Canal treaty would probably have easily been approved long ago. Without pressure from their constituents, a sufficient number of Senators would doubtless have voted for the pact. Perhaps Senators would show more respect for their constituents by assuming that they, too, can understand the merits of the case if it is properly explained to them. By supporting the treaty at a time when leadership is urgently needed, the Senators under the sharpest attack may look back on this episode with considerable pride.

Franklin Roosevelt generally gets credit for reversing the old Yankee imperialist, Colossus of the North Jingoist stance toward Latin America. The second Roosevelt upending the interventionist policies of the first: It made for instant political mythology.

In fact, FDR's "good neighbor policy did mark a new era in Latin American relations. That first year of his presidency he dispatched a U.S. delegation to an International Conference of American States meeting at Montevideo. Out of that came a formal document on "The Rights and Duties of States," which the United States signed. Article 8 declared: "No state has the right to intervene in the internal or external affairs of another."

It was a sweeping renunciation of the right of intervention that had been troubling the hemisphere during the era of gunboat diplomacy and the dispatching of the Marines to protect our interests—mainly private investments—for so many years.

But the truth is it was Roosevelt's predecessor, the historically unlucky Herbert Hoover, who should get the praise for putting America on a different course toward its neighbors. Until Hoover's presidency, American policy was militaristic and arrogant: we did what we pleased, whenever and however we wished.

Hoover changed that. Not long after taking office he stated flatly that it "ought not to be the policy of the United States to intervene by force to secure or maintain contracts between our citizens and foreign states or their citizens." In other words, he promised never to intervene to protect American property rights abroad. Even despite the great pressures of the Depression, when debts were repudiated throughout Latin America, he never wavered in his resolve.

His Republican administration had made possible the acceptance of FDR's further pledges and policies.

From that point on, the United States repeatedly reiterated its approval of the principle of nonintervention. Roosevelt traveled to a celebrated Buenos Aires conference in 1936 at which a new treaty strengthening the pledge not to intervene "directly or indirectly" was signed by 22 nations, including the United States.

Over the decades those principles have been reaffirmed legally and in writing, again and again by this nation—and not only as regards the hemisphere. In the U.N. charter, in the charter of the Organization of American States, in declarations signed at Chapultepec, Mexico in 1945, in the Treaty of Rio de Janeiro after World War II—all these brought fresh United States pledges against intervention.

Nor does the record end there. In the Helsinki accords, signed three years ago by President Ford, similar statements received our pledges. When he spoke to the Helsinki conference after signing the documents, Ford said "The United States gladly subscribes to this document because we subscribe to every one of these principles." Nonintervention was first among the basic principles of relations between states he cited. It was followed by, in Ford's words, "sovereign equality, self-determination, territorial integrity, inviolability of frontiers."

That same year a new protocol to the Rio Treaty was signed at San Jose. A new article provided that: "Nothing stipulated in this treaty shall be interpreted as limiting or impairing in any way the principle of nonintervention . . ." And the United States also voted in favor of a resolution then which reaffirmed "solemnly the principle of nonintervention."

All in all, hardly an ambiguous record.

Before the Senate voted on the first Canal treaty last month, the president struck a bargain with a little-known Democratic senator from Arizona. The deal: the senator, Dennis DeConcini, would vote for the treaty if the president would support an amendment DeConcini proposed. Carter agreed, the arrangement was made public.

DeConcini's amendment which the Senate adopted, gives the United States the unilateral and perpetual right to intervene in Panama militarily if the canal is closed or its operations are in any way interfered with, as defined by the United States. As DeConcini told the Senate:

"There are no conditions, no exceptions, and no limitations on this right. By the terms of the amendment, the United States interprets when such a need exists, and exercises its own judgment as the means necessary to insure that the canal remain open and accessible."

And, his key passage on the use of military force:

"These words are absolutely crucial because they establish the American right . . . to take military action if the case so warrants. It further makes it clear that the United States can take military action on Panamanian soil without the consent of the Panamanian government."

As Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said at the time, Panama was being asked "to accept an amendment which has the right of military interventionism—not just during this century, but for all time."

Whether Panama finally accepts or rejects that outrageous interference in its sovereign affairs is not the point here—although that language clearly holds disturbing implications for all nations with which the United States has relations. The point is whether this country's repeated pledges mean what they say.

It's inconceivable that a single U.S. senator would accept such intrusion in the affairs of his state, by any force, anywhere, anytime. It should also be inconceivable for the Senate to fail to recognize that this language establishes an unworthy, and unnecessary, principle.

Mr. GRAVEL. Now, how do we get ourselves out of this dilemma? I think it is not going to be an easy task to get out of this dilemma, because the Senator from Alabama is a very bright parliamentarian and he sees the flaw in what has taken place. We can be sure we are not going to have an easy time in correcting the situation.

I think what we have to look forward to is some degree of difficulty. I would suggest there are ways to correct it and that is to face the music. When we have made a mistake, just confess it and go forward. Here is the music we have to face—the Senate of the United States may not be mature enough to vote the right thing.

I think it would be a terrible tragedy, a national tragedy, to have these treaties fail, but we may not be mature enough to vote it. There may not be enough courage on this floor to vote for what is right.

We can do one thing. We can pack these treaties up, if we cannot carry the vote straight out without watering it down, which would require that the Panamanians then vote the treaties down. We owe it to ourselves to give them a decent agreement. We negotiated one and we have one before us.

Now, I do not think it is going to be very wise to pack up an agreement and send it down to them and they vote against it. Let us be honest, at least, about that and bring it for an up or down vote. If we do not have the votes, fine. That does not stop the leadership of the Senate from trying to work its craft, and that is to effect compromise, to make little turns so we could pick up some votes. There is nothing wrong with that. That is what leadership is all about, and what they are trying to do. I commend them for that and I hope in the next few days they will be able to work something out, that is, something that will correct the DeConcini reservation.

There will be no way of slipping by it. If we do not have the votes, the treaties will fail, and the failure will clearly be with this body. It will not be sloughed off on somebody in Panama, or sloughed off on President Carter, or sloughed off on the House. It will be our responsibility, if we were not courageous enough or mature enough to vote it.

I would also recommend, if that is the case, what we do is take the treaties back to the Foreign Relations Committee and leave them there until after the election. This issue would surface as a big issue in the election. Some people would win and some would lose on it. And after, take them out next February and have another vote. There might be a little more courage in this body since the election would be 2 years away, and there might be enough votes to go ahead and pass the treaties.

It is always going to be a question of passing the treaties or not passing the treaties, because this issue is going to have to correct itself.

Those opposed to the treaties are living in another world that does not exist and it will not come back. So we have to go with change that will accommodate justice between ourselves and Panama.

There is another possibility and I just thought of it today. I have spoken of it privately to my colleague from Alabama, because one thing sort of rankles me a little bit, and it is a simple little thing. We are so proud of our democracy in the United States and we vilify, unfortunately, Mr. Torrijos so badly, and his leadership, dictators, and that kind of government, but, in point of fact, on this treaty he had a plebiscite.

He was more democratic in the handling of the treaty in Panama than we have been in the United States. This is not to criticize ourselves, because we are structurally bound in the Constitution on the way we do a thing. But I think a person from Mars looking at the way both nations handled the issue, would have to admit that "dictatorship" handled it a lot more democratically than the "democratic" government did.

So it might not be a bad idea to have a little experiment in the Nation, and let us have a plebiscite. I do not know but I will do some research in the next few days, and if it looks legally possible maybe I will offer it to my good friend from Alabama to cosponsor it with me and we will have a plebiscite in the United States.

Why should the Senate of the United States take all the heat from its constituents in voting for this very difficult issue?

That is the reason why the treaties cannot pass. We are afraid to vote for what is right. So why not just let the people make that decision? That is very dangerous—I say that sincerely, not with tongue in cheek.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 15 minutes have expired.

Mr. GRAVEL. I am almost finished, may I have another 2, 3, 4, or 5 minutes?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield an additional 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Alaska without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Alaska is recognized for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, following that, I ask unanimous consent I might yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. SCOTT) such time as he may request without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRAVEL. I thank my colleague. He is most generous.

As I stated, I would hope, if we do decide that a U.S. plebiscite might be worth while, that he would join me. I think it is something at this point to investigate.

I do not say it lightly, that this would be an unusual event, because I think——

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator yield very briefly?

Mr. GRAVEL. No. If I might just finish.

Is it for an unanimous-consent request? I want to finish what I am saying.

Mr. SCOTT. It is on the question of the plebiscite. There has been a plebiscite in one city in California. The treaty was defeated by a margin of more than 5 to 1.

Mr. GRAVEL. That is fine. In fact, that is the point I want to make right now.

If we had had a plebiscite, let us say, about in the 1880's or 1870's on the Indian policy that was undertaken by the United States of America, I think that Indian policy might best be characterized by General Sherman's statement at a dinner in New York when he held up a nickle and made the statement that the best Indians were dead Indians.

I think if we had had a plebiscite in the United States of America at that time, the American people would have voted for that policy. Very tragic.

I think if we had had a plebiscite on the Vietnam War in 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969, or 1970, that probably the American people would have voted for that holocaust, that murderous event we had in Southeast Asia. I think that would have been a tragedy.

I think that 6 months ago if we had had a plebiscite on the treaties, they probably would have been defeated, and that would have been a terrible tragedy for American foreign policy.

But the test of a democracy and the test of the people and the test of the Senate is all the same test. It is, are we mature enough to handle representative government? That is the test. Are we mature enough to have a better society with justice? That is the test.

I would be prepared to put the American people to that test.

I am not too sure that the Senate of the United States is mature enough to vote for these treaties without mirrors. We are just playing with some mirrors and it has backfired in our faces.

I will submit that we are just beginning to get the rumblings out of Panama. There will be a lot more than that. So if we cannot pass the treaties without the DeConcini-type amendments, we cannot pass the treaties and we ought to know that.

If the American people are not prepared to vote for these treaties, if there is a new regime of justice between ourselves and Panama, then the world ought to know that, because how else can we grow, how else can we improve ourselves if we do not know our deficiencies?

We can go ahead and spout the rhetoric of how great we are, what great things we do, how we do not believe in intervention, and then go ahead and intervene through the CIA, go ahead and intervene with the Bay of Pigs. We may have had 40 years of nonintervention policy. The only problem is that we did not practice it.

The sooner we cut out these delusions that we have about what we are or are not, the sooner we are going to be a great people, greater than we are.

So I favor a rhetorical point of view this evening and can only say, what is the danger of having a plebiscite by the American people? Let them rip their guts out the way the Senate has been. Let the dialog take place with all the people. Let those who sit back and say, "I don't have time to get interested in this issue, and we'll give the money to the radical right to fight the issue"—if they want it taken over by the radical right, all they have to do is lay back.

There are no free rides in citizenship. This issue is so vital, affecting our relationship with the most important part of the world to us, this entire hemisphere, that we cannot skid by and slough off on this issue.

So if the American people think they can continue gunboat diplomacy, if that is what they want, then let them vote for it. I have a higher opinion of the American people than that. I cannot think of a better way to educate the American people than that by letting them be a part of the decisionmaking process. It would not be all that difficult. We could have a referendum, a plebiscite, in this country next November, when we are going to have national elections; and the people can vote for or against the treaties as they stand, the way the Panamanian people have done.

After an investigation, I will come back to this body and report whether that is a feasible alternative. I certainly will counsel with my colleagues from Alabama, who is fond of plebiscites for Panama. If they are good for Panama, they are good for us.

I thank my colleague for his accommodation on this subject. I am sure I am giving him food for thought and reason for dialog, and I will listen to his views attentively. I thank him.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional 5 minutes of the Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL) have expired.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. SCOTT), with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I appreciate the distinguished Senator from Alabama yielding to me briefly.

I speak now only because of the statements made by my friend from Alaska. It seemed quite obvious that he was being critical and in complete opposition to the views of the distinguished Senator from Alabama.

One thing about a government such as we have, with the two bodies of Congress, is that we can say almost anything we wish to say on either the floor of the House or the floor of the Senate, and that is part of the legislative process. We can have a difference of opinion without being disagreeable with one another.

While I do have the highest respect for my distinguished friend from Alaska, I have a very minimum of high regard for the position he has taken and the words he has spoken for the last 20 minutes or so. I disagree with the Senator from Alaska in almost everything he said.

He has referred to the opponents of the treaty as being desirous of toppling the government of Torrijos. He has referred to some Members of the Senate as mentioning that Torrijos is a dictator. I believe everybody knows that we have a lawful government in Panama, an elected government in Panama. There was a coup, and the present chief of state of Panama, through the use of the Guardia Nacionale, the National Guard of Panama, assumed the position he now occupies.

I think he is a dictator. I do not believe there is any doubt that General Torrijos is a dictator. Why not say "the Dictator in Panama"? He is a dictator. We say, "the President of the United States." He is the President of the United States.

The distinguished Senator speaks of putting America to the test. I agree with this statement, but in a way different from that of the distinguished Senator from Alaska. I think America is being put to the test. America is put to the test in many ways.

We are thought of as being one of the leaders of the free world. If we submit to the wishes of the Government of Panama, of Dictator Torrijos, is that going to mean that in the world of public opinion, the United States is going to stand a little higher? I think not. I think the nations of the world will doubt whether the United States will stand up for itself.

Under the treaty that is now under consideration, we would give away $9.8 billion worth of U.S. Government property, and we would pay the Republic of Panama for taking it: about $1.5 billion in tolls; and approximately $750 million in either tax revenue or loss of tax revenue by the United States between now and the time the treaty would end.

It was said that Panama might reject the treaty, as if that would be a bad thing; that Panama might reject the treaty, because of the amendments. To my knowledge, there have been no amendments. The DeConcini amendment was not an amendment; it was an understanding. There is considerable doubt as to whether it has any binding authority.

I believe the disturbance we hear about is very much like the Uncle Remus story of Brer Rabbit: "Please don't throw me in the briar patch." After he was thrown in the briar patch, he mentioned that he was born and bred in the briar patch.

I think the Panamanian Government wants the sovereignty, the title, the control of the Canal Zone. I believe that once they have the sovereignty, the title, and the control, they can say, much like Brer Rabbit said—that that is really what they had in mind.

When we speak of demogoguery, of cowering to public opinion, of listening to the voice of the people of this country, that is the kind of government I believe we have. I believe that is the kind of government our Founding Fathers obtained for us when we won our independence. We have a republican form of government or a representative democracy. We are here to act on behalf of the American people.

I had a poll taken of the people of Virginia as to how they felt about this canal. I posed the simple question: "Do you favor the ratification of the canal treaties?" Eighty-seven percent of the people of Virginia who responded said they favored rejection of the treaty. Only 13 percent favored ratification.

The Senator speaks of returning this to the committee and having a vote after the election. I would support him in any move such as that because I think that after the election and after each Senator has been assured of how the people felt, we would have no difficulty in rejecting these treaties. I believe that after the election, some of the Senators in the class that is up for election this time will not be here to vote on the treaty.

We can read from the Federalist Papers and we can read from the letters that Thomas Jefferson wrote the statements made by some of the early Americans who were prominent in the formulation of our Government; and we find such statements as, "The only safe depository for the government is in the people themselves."

So while we are Senators and while we are elected to exercise our own judgment to a certain extent, I do not believe we are elected to fly—or would be elected if the people felt that we were going to fly—in the face of the overwhelming majority of the people of America.

To me the people of this country do not want this giveaway treaty, and I am not really concerned about the people of Panama. I was elected by the people of Virginia, the people of the United States and I feel that it is the duty of every Member of this Senate to do what is best in his judgment for the United States. We are U.S. Senators. Sometimes I hear voices on this floor that speak in such a way as one, a stranger to this body, might think that they were Senators from Panama rather than the Senators from particular States.

I am not going to attribute that to any individual Senator, but basically we are here to listen to the voice of the people and we are here to represent the people who elected us to office. In a nation of 215 million or 220 million people, of course, it is impossible to have a true democracy, but I would like for us to have representative government as closely as we can to representing the will of the people. The people are opposed to this treaty, and I feel that the treaty should be rejected.

Mr. President, I have talked with the distinguished majority leader, and I expect that he is probably listening to the discussions here on the floor over the device in his office, and I told him that I would like to have time after the vote on the Stevens amendment on Wednesday. I understand the vote is to be not later than 4 o'clock on Wednesday of this week. And I ask unanimous consent that I might be recognized after the vote on the Stevens amendment to discuss the treaty and to offer an amendment if I see fit to do so at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland reserves the right to object.

Mr. SARBANES. Did I understand from the Senator that he discussed this request that he has just made with the majority leader and the majority leader acceded to it?

Mr. SCOTT. He indicated he would make the request on my behalf if I wanted him to do it. So there is no conflict with the majority leader.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, on, as I understand it, that understanding, that the majority leader has acceded to the unanimous-consent request which the Senator from Virginia has just propounded, I will, of course, not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I appreciate the distinguished Senator from Alabama yielding this time to me, and certainly I would not want to infringe further upon his time, but I did want to take the opportunity of making the unanimous-consent request while I was on the floor.

I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the hour is growing late, and I shall not detain the Senate a great while.

We have been discussing this afternoon the DeConcini amendment to the Neutrality Treaty, and my interest in the amendment at this time is caused by the fact that the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) was seeking by an expression of views on the floor at this time, some 3 weeks after the agreement on the DeConcini amendment and the approval of the Neutrality Treaty, to establish legislative history with respect to the DeConcini amendment.

Of course, it is not possible to establish legislative history with respect to something that has already taken place, because legislative history is supposed to give the background of and to explain the reasons why the Senate acted as it did with respect to a particular legislative matter, and the legislative history must be created before the action on the legislative proposal, because it explains why the Senate did what it did when it took such action.

So the door is closed now to creating legislative history with respect to the DeConcini amendment.

The second proposal that the distinguished Senator from Idaho suggested was that something must be done in this treaty to indicate, in effect, that the DeConcini amendment means something other than what the DeConcini amendment provides. How we are going to be able to do that I do not know. It cannot be done and obtain the approval of this treaty, in my judgment. Of course, I know the leadership has more than 51 Senators who would vote for a proposal submitted by the leadership as a solution of this dilemma. But in doing so, Mr. President, I feel confident that the leadership would lose enough votes of Senators who voted for the first treaty on account of the DeConcini amendment and do not want any weakening of that amendment.

Also, Mr. President, it seems to me that it would be, in effect, going back on a trade, and we will have to admit that trading took place, that the DeConcini amendment was approved by the administration, in return several Senators voted for the treaty who would not have voted for the first treaty without the DeConcini amendment. Having obtained the approval of the first treaty by agreeing to the DeConcini amendment, it comes with poor grace, it seems to the Senator from Alabama, to suggest that we must undercut the DeConcini amendment, make it say something that the words do not say, that were not said here on the floor, because, after all, a trade should be a trade, I assume. And the distinguished Senator from Alaska seemed to be pretty well of that opinion that we made a mistake, the Senate made a mistake, when it agreed to the DeConcini amendment, but it was necessary to pass the treaty.

Having obtained the benefits of the passage of the DeConcini amendment, and having obtained the approval of the treaty by this device, how can the leadership, the managers of the treaty, come forward and say that the DeConcini amendment does not mean what it was thought to have meant and what it says that it means by a mere reading of the wording of the DeConcini amendment?

Mr. President, one of the chief reasons given for the approval of these treaties by the Senate was that it was necessary in order to remove the danger of sabotage to agree to these treaties, to eliminate riots, insurrection, guerrilla action against the canal.

Well, it seems somewhat anomalous that it seems likely, based on the fact that some riots and demonstrations were already taking place in Panama, that the approval of the Senate of these treaties will result in riots in Panama and not eliminate them.

I commend the distinguished Senator from Alaska for his praise of the President in regard to these treaties. He has taken an unpopular issue and has pushed it to near approval by the Senate. But, as the distinguished Senator from Alaska says, a mistake was made. The proponents of the treaties have made their bed and now they should lie in it. They agreed to the DeConcini reservation to pass the treaty, and now they do not know what to do with it except to try to undercut it.

My authority for that is the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) who said there is something that has got to be done, and it has got to be done in the next few days, to indicate a different meaning to the DeConcini reservation from what has been attached to that reservation.

You tamper with this treaty in that regard, try to undercut DeConcini, and you are going to lose this treaty.

I would say, Mr. President, that Dictator Torrijos—I say that with apologies to my distinguished friend from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL)—must be a most unhappy man in Panama at this time. If he presents this treaty to the Panamanian people I believe, just as does the distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL), that the people of Panama will overwhelmingly defeat the treaty.

If it goes the other route, as head of state ratifying the treaty, he is going to be toppled in Panama just as sure as can be, in the judgment of the Senator from Alabama.

So apparently the effort will be made to change the meaning of the DeConcini reservation to provide in some way that it does not have a meaning that the Panamanians attach to it and that a reading of the reservation would indicate.

Mr. President, the treaties were negotiated by American and Panamanian negotiators. They were submitted to the Senate. A memorandum was agreed to between the President and the dictator. That memorandum became the leadership amendment, which was accepted here in the Senate and, I might say, that it promised the most and delivered the least; that is, the leadership amendment, of any amendment, any major amendment, that I have seen presented here in the Senate.

So, Mr. President, if there are ambiguities—and they abound—if there are ambiguities in the treaties and in the amendment, whose fault is it? Is it the fault of those who have sought to strengthen these treaties or failing in that to defeat them? Well, hardly. We have not been able to pass a single amendment. So if we have a treaty full of ambiguities, it is the responsibility of the American negotiators, it is the responsibility of the administration, it is the responsibility of the leadership, and it is the responsibility of the managers of these treaties. They have controlled collectively every single word that has gone into these treaties or into the resolution of ratification, every single word. So do not let them say the opposition to the treaties has caused this sad state of affairs. The people of Panama do not want this treaty. Mr. GRAVEL, a strong supporter of the treaty, says the people of Panama would overwhelmingly defeat the treaties if submitted to them.

Well, all through this debate, Mr. President, the managers of the treaties have tried to indicate that the opponents of the treaties have spoken disparagingly or put in a poor light the Panamanians, whereas they have held up for the sovereign rights of the Panamanians, and far be it from them to say anything derogatory about the Panamanian people.

Well, Mr. President, let us examine that a moment. If there have been any derogatory statement made of any Panamanian citizens it has not been something said about the people of Panama as such. But in the main it has been directed at the Panamanian dictator. As to the people of Panama it is our wish that they have an opportunity to vote on what the Senate has done.

The distinguished Senator from Alaska (Mr. GRAVEL) said:

Well, the Senator from Alabama wants a plebiscite because he knows the Panamanian people will vote down the treaty.

It is the position of the Senator from Alabama that I would not object to seeing them voting down the treaty, but it is the position of the Senator from Alabama that if the treaty is to be agreed to it needs to be agreed to by the people of Panama because that is the best opportunity, Mr. President, agreement by the people of Panama is the best opportunity, we have to prevent riots, to prevent demonstrations, to prevent sabotage because those who are protesting in Panama now against the treaties are protesting because that is something the U.S. Senate, they feel, is ramming down their throats.

But if we condition our approval on a plebiscite in Panama that would be the people of Panama acting, and the legs would be cut from under any demonstration against the treaties. But let Dictator Torrijos approve these treaties and you are going to see bloodshed in Panama. They do not like the treaty. They do not like the treaty as agreed to by the Senate. I first thought Mr. Torrijos was just engaging in a ploy to see to it that no further amendments were agreed to. But I can sense his great difficulty in Panama in satisfying the people with respect to the action that has been taken.

Now, is that done by the opposition to the treaties? Was the DeConcini amendment put in by any one of the 32 Senators who voted against the Neutrality Treaty? No, it was not. Were any of the reservations put in by any of the 32 Senators who voted against the treaty? No, not to my knowledge, and I was here all the time.

This treaty as it now exists is the product of the administration and the leadership, and I submit that with the tremendous majority they have had on votes here in the Senate, they find the treaties not giving satisfaction to a large percentage of the people of the United States—I believe a great majority—and they are not giving satisfaction to a great number of Panamanians, and I believe a majority there.

And who is responsible for it? Is it the opposition to the treaties? No; the proponents have had carte blanche to word the treaties as they wanted to. They have knocked down all amendments offered by the opposition. They have not improved the treaties in any way suggested by the opposition. They have shaped the treaties and the reservations to suit themselves; they had full control.

Now, after having done that, after having accepted and recommended the DeConcini amendment to the Senate, they are unhappy with what they have done.

I do not believe the Senate is going to get the matter out from under that difficulty. Oh, I do not mean they cannot pass an amendment saying that the DeConcini amendment is meaningless, it means nothing, it does not change the leadership amendments. But it does, Mr. President. It gives the United States the right unilaterally to keep the canal open when the United States deems it necessary, and to use military power to keep it open if that is necessary. And that is a departure from the leadership amendment, because it was couched in three limitations—the leadership amendment, mind you, has a paragraph in there put in by the Panamanians, put in by the dictator or his representative, that qualifies our right to intervene to protect the canal. In the first place, we could not interfere with the internal affairs of Panama; second, we could not interfere with the territory of Panama; and third, we could not interfere with the independence of Panama.

In effect, we agreed that the dictatorial regime of dictator Torrijos would be preserved. And, of course, the treaties start pouring in $100 million a year into Torrijos' coffers and, of course, they want that to get started right away.

So, Mr. President, I hate to see this treaty, with its supposed affront—I do not feel that it is—its supposed affront to Panama, to see the Panamanians reject it if a plebiscite is held, or, if not subjected to a plebiscite, to see the upheaval that seems certain to come about if the treaties are approved and submitted to Panama in their present form.

So, Mr. President, if the plebiscite is held, yes, I would hope that the Panamanians would reject the treaties, because I believe that the Panamanians should have the right to make the decision on this matter. It should not be made by Torrijos, and if it is made by Torrijos only, it is going to cause riots and demonstrations, and a probable upheaval in Panama.

Whether the people turn it down or whether the people approve it, it would come nearer having the backing of all Panamanians than if we turn it down. But it seems that if it is submitted to them all, it is going to cause considerable rioting in Panama.

Mr. President, after the President, and the leadership, and the Senators who voted for this first treaty have gone to such a great length to please the Panamanian people, to fight off amendments, to reach a compromise with some of the Senators on the DeConcini amendment, to be on the verge of giving them the canal, and then to have riots and demonstrations in Panama, with the President of the United States, who has stuck his neck out to get these treaties approved, hanged in effigy in Panama, I think certainly indicates a lack of appreciation of those who have cast their lot with Torrijos and who have sought to prevent any changes in these treaties. And yet, because they are not liked by all in Panama, we see this demonstration against them.

Mr. President, like it or not, the DeConcini amendment is part of this treaty, and——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I take it the Senator is going to support the treaty now with the DeConcini amendment attached?

Mr. ALLEN. The DeConcini amendment has been voted on. It is a part of the Neutrality Treaty.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. But I say, I take it the Senator is going to support this treaty with the DeConcini amendment?

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the Senator has heard my statement. I have indicated no such thing.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, I have listened to the Senator today expound on the DeConcini amendment, and I have been utterly amazed, as I am sure the people of Panama must be amazed, to find that they have such a friend as the very able Senator from Alabama has demonstrated himself to be.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I am trying to protect their right to have a voice in this treaty. I surely am.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator has demonstrated his friendship for the Panamanians today, and I am sure that my amazement has been surpassed only by that of the Panamanians.

Mr. SARBANES. If I could say——

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the people of Panama will come nearer approving of the position of the Senator from Alabama than they will approving of the position of those who are sending these treaties down to Panama against which they are now demonstrating.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator has even predicted, and I have heard him predict today more than once—several times—that if the treaties are submitted by plebiscite to the people of Panama, they will reject them. Not only that, but there will be riots and demonstrations in Panama; that Torrijos will get his walking papers. Did I hear the Senator predict that?

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator listened carefully, I said that, in my judgment, the public sentiment was so strong in Panama against the treaty, as finally agreed to here in the Senate, that if the matter is not submitted to plebiscite and dictator Torrijos ratifies it on his own, that will result in toppling dictator Torrijos, on account of public sentiment in Panama. That is my opinion.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator is going out on a limb.

Mr. ALLEN. That is all right. The Senator from West Virginia has gone out on a limb in sending a treaty down to Panama which will meet with so much popular disapproval. He has gone out on a limb and the limb is being chopped off by Dictator Torrijos.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator from Alabama predicted the other day that the amendment by Mr. HATCH would garner more votes in the Senate than any other amendment had to date.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That was a prediction.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, it was. I will answer that. I thought the distinguished Senator from West Virginia would be one of those voting for it. Back in 1975 he was a cosponsor of a resolution that called for there to be no cession to Panama or other divestiture of U.S.-owned property, tangible or intangible, without prior authorization by the Congress, the House and Senate, as provided in article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the U.S. Constitution.

The distinguished Senator from West Virginia, I recognize, might change his position with regard to a treaty, but I did not feel that he would change his mind with respect to a constitutional issue and his view of that constitutional issue as expressed in this resolution back in 1975, of which the distinguished Senator from West Virginia was a cosponsor.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, but——

Mr. ALLEN. Can I finish, please?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator let me respond?

Mr. ALLEN. I had not finished. I thought that the Senator, along with seven other Senators who voted for the first treaty but were cosponsors of this resolution, both as to House action being required and as to their being no agreement on the Panama Canal treaty, would go along with what they had advocated back in 1975.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. What the distinguished Senator from Alabama did is he did not wait for any hearings; he did not wait to hear what the Joint Chiefs might say; he did not even wait until we had a treaty before the Senate. He announced his opposition. He did not wait for any hearings; he did not wait for any testimony.

He did not wait for any evidence; he did not wait for anything to change his mind. He made up his mind in the beginning. I respect him. He has stuck by his guns. But he is determined to defeat these treaties one way or another by amendment. We can adopt every amendment the Senator has offered to this treaty, and I dare say—of course, I do not know—I would venture to say that he would still vote against the treaties. He announced that in the very beginning. He made 24 speeches last year that he was against the treaties.

Now that the Senate has turned down most of the amendments thus far, he is grasping at a straw. He continues to grasp every little straw that comes along in the wind. Now he talks about demonstrations in Panama. He talks about submitting the treaty to another plebiscite. The constitution of Panama provides that the treaty be submitted to the people for a plebiscite, and that was done. Now he seeks to write into this treaty an amendment that would force on the people of Panama what in essence would be a constitutional change in that country.

The Senator from Alabama did not change his mind. His mind is not subjected to being changed on this.

I have twice laid on the record my response to what the Senator has just read.

Mr. ALLEN. Did the Senator take one view in 1975 of the constitutional issue about whether the House needed to act, whether it needed action by the Congress? Did he change his mind on that constitutional issue as well as on the desirability of the treaty?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I will ask the Senator a question. Did the Supreme Court ever change its mind on a constitutional issue?

Mr. ALLEN. That is not what I asked the Senator. Has the Senator changed his mind?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am asking the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator declines to state it——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I do not decline to state it. But if the Supreme Court can change its position on a constitutional issue and with good reason——

Mr. ALLEN. I am not asking that question.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am giving the answer.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not asking about the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I heard the Senator. I am answering this as I want to answer it, if he wants me to. If the Supreme Court changed its position on a constitutional question, I think that any Senator should retain the same right, and he has the same duty, to change his position on a constitutional question if, in his judgment, after more thorough study of that question he sees that he was wrong the first time. He should change. I did see that I had not considered that question the first time. I just signed a resolution. Someone came around and asked, "Will you sign this resolution?"

Mr. ALLEN. It does not sound like the distinguished Senator from West Virginia would sign something without knowing what is in it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No; he does not, ordinarily. I submit I did not give it the careful thought I should have. Beside that, I did not have the treaties before me at that time.

Mr. ALLEN. I am talking about the constitutional question. It has nothing to do with the treaties.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That is all right. I have studied the constitutional question thoroughly. I have made two or three speeches on that constitutional question lately. I have thought it over. I have done some research and I have come to what I think now is the right conclusion. So like the Supreme Court of the United States, which reverses itself from time to time, I retain that same right. I think it is my duty. I did change my view.

Mr. ALLEN. I asked has the Senator changed his mind?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. But I was not required to answer the Senator's first question. I dealt with it, built on it block by block, and then my peroration, and then the final sentence. And the court of appeals has upheld my position. They upheld my position.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator changed his mind from his 1975 position on both scores, on the advisability of the treaty and on the constitutional issue involved, is that correct?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. On the advisability of the treaty, I did not have the treaty before me.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator said something about somebody changing his mind. My opinion was announced back under President Nixon. My opinion was announced in a newsletter that I sent out to some of my constituents over the State back in October 1971. I saw the treaties coming on, just as the distinguished Senator from West Virginia did, in 1975. I guess he had an idea about whether the canal was going to be given to Panama or not when he joined in this resolution. The Senator from Alabama did not form his opinion just recently. Obviously, he did not change his mind.

I appreciate the Senator saying the Senator from Alabama has not changed his mind.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And is not going to.

Mr. ALLEN. Not on this particular issue, no.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. No.

Mr. ALLEN. I have made up my mind on it. My position is justified by the facts and by the confusion in which the supporters of the treaties now find themselves.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. If the distinguished Senator from West Virginia is through propounding his question.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have temporarily withdrawn from the field.

Mr. ALLEN. I think it might be well.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. But I am going to witness the continuing engagement. I had to leave my weary steed at the door, where they required that I hitch him to the hitching post, and my blunted sword I have thrown aside for a moment. I just wish I had that blue blade that the king's son bears from Alabama. I can fully defend the position which I take today——

Mr. ALLEN. I know the Senator has answered to his satisfaction.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD (continuing). On the treaty and on the constitutional question. And I am supported by the recent decision of the court of appeals, which I realize chagrined the distinguished Senator from Alabama and those who supported him in their unsound position vis-a-vis the constitutional question. I feel rather good that the court of appeals supported me, and I am sure that the Senator from Alabama recognizes that what the appeals court has done will probably stand if it should go to the Supreme Court.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad the distinguished majority leader knows what the Supreme Court is going to do, because very few of us know.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have as much right to make a judgment as to what the Supreme Court will do as the Senator from Alabama has as to the Panamanian people.

Mr. ALLEN. I have some indication as to the Panamanian people. If the Senator has been reading about the riots down in Panama and the burning of the President down there in effigy, he would have some feeling about the opinion of the people in Panama. I doubt if the Senator has any pipelines into the thinking of the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I need only to look at previous decisions.

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, I see. So the Senator is confident that the Supreme Court is going to sustain that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I have no doubt; no doubt.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad the distinguished majority leader has no doubt.

I am highly honored that the distinguished Senator comes in from time to time and propounds questions to me and, in addition to propounding questions, makes lengthy comments on the remarks of the Senator from Alabama. I do not recall his so honoring any of the other Senators who have sought to approve these treaties or, in the alternative, to defend them. I feel highly honored that the distinguished majority leader does come in from time to time to engage me in colloquy. I appreciate that.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator recognizes my great respect for the Senator from Alabama. I have the greatest respect. I do not say that facetiously; I do have. But I just felt constrained, as I listened to the Senator's stentorian voice, almost in dulcet tones as it came across public radio, to come in and just ask on what basis the Senator could predict, as he has predicted, some of the things that he has stated today.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I have predicted that if this matter is submitted to plebiscite, it will be defeated. I am backed up in that opinion by the distinguished Senator from Alaska, who supports the treaty. He states unequivocally that, in his judgment, these treaties, if submitted to plebiscite in Panama, would be overwhelmingly defeated. He made that remark within the last 45 minutes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The Senator from Alaska has a right to that opinion. I personally do not have any way of knowing.

Mr. ALLEN. I feel that is an indication of the view of the leadership from the fact that the distinguished manager of the treaty, the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) has said on this floor, do not approve this amendment, because any amendment will result in the defeat of the treaties. I assume he meant by that that the people of Panama would reject a treaty that had been amended. I believe, if I am not mistaken, that the distinguished majority leader has argued that point on the floor of the Senate, making that very same argument.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I am not sure.

Mr. ALLEN. I am rather sure, I say to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I remember an occasion or two before, when the Senator thought that I had said something and we had the transcript read and we found that the Senator from Alabama was wrong. I do not think I have——

Mr. ALLEN. I do not recall that occasion. But I accept that the distinguished Senator does.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Well, maybe I am wrong again. But I do not think I have made that argument. Maybe I have.

Mr. ALLEN. That has been the Senator's opinion, has it not, that the treaty should not be amended?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Oh, no; I offered a joint leadership amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that, but that was based on the memorandum between the dictator and the President. But aside from the so-called leadership amendment, which, with all due respect—and the Senator did not write those amendments or I would not make this statement—promise the most and give the least of any amendments that have been offered heretofore, I might say.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Of course, that is the opinion of the Senator from Alabama, because his one objective here is to defeat the treaties one way or another. And if he can demean the leadership amendment, he would do it anyway to achieve that basic goal of defeating the treaties. The Senator would not vote for these treaties if the Senate had adopted every one, every one of the amendments that the Senator from Alabama has offered, and he knows that.

Mr. ALLEN. The distinguished Senator said that the Senator from Alabama would defeat these treaties any way that he could. Of course, the Senator from Alabama would defeat the treaties any way that he honorably could. But I recall——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I agree.

Mr. ALLEN. I am not stating this as honorable or dishonorable, but the facts can speak for themselves.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. It is not dishonorable, and I did not mean to impute anything like that.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand. But we do know that the DeConcini amendment was accepted by the leadership, because the President had agreed on the DeConcini amendment and had used that in order to get at least one and possibly two or three votes for the treaties. That is the point that the Senator from Alabama has been making this afternoon, that, having accepted the DeConcini amendment, based on what the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) has said, an effort is going to be made in this treaty to put in a provision to indicate that the DeConcini amendment means something somewhat different from what it meant at the time the DeConcini amendment was agreed to. The Senate, thereafter, agreed to the treaty and the cosponsors of the DeConcini amendment were found voting for the treaty.

I do not think the Senator from Alabama is doing anything other than arguing this matter on its merits. If he can contribute to the defeat of the treaties, I believe that he has rendered a public service. But the Senator from Alabama has no concessions to make to anybody. He cannot ask them if they have any concerns about the treaty. He cannot have meetings of doubtful Senators and inquire about their concern. All he has is the logic, which I believe is backed by the people of the United States; whereas, of course, the administration has other facts that they can call into play——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And the leadership.

Mr. ALLEN (continuing). In an effort to get votes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Do not leave out the leadership.

Mr. ALLEN. That is the Senator saying that. I would not suggest that the distinguished majority leader would make any concession to any Senator to get him to vote for the treaty; far from it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not underestimate his capabilities and the resources that he has at his command. He is chairman of a subcommittee. He conducted hearings on the constitutional aspect.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; we have done that and made our report.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. They have had lengthy hearings; he has made his report. So he does, he is not disarmed by the support that he has to depend on, logic alone. He does an excellent job in conducting hearings. He brought forth a report. So let it not be said that the Senator from Alabama is without spear or buckler or shield or sword. I would not want the Senator from Alabama to leave us with that impression.

Mr. ALLEN. He certainly is not heavily armed, I say to the distinguished majority leader, who has so much power in this body. The Senator knows I am one of his staunchest supporters.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

● Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, Luis Kutner, a Chicago attorney and president of the Commission for International Due Process of Law, has written an excellent article entitled, The New Panama Canal Treaties: A Potential Diplomatic Pearl Harbor.

Mr. Kutner is an internationally famous attorney and author on Habeas Corpus and Human Rights. He is the author of World Habeas Corpus and chairman of the World Freedom Centers. He was nominated for the 1975–76 Nobel Peace Prize and has been extremely active worldwide promoting human rights.

Mr. Kutner's article is very informative on the canal issue and concludes that the United States should not abandon the Panama Canal and give back the sovereignty over the Canal Zone to Panama.

Mr. President, I ask that this article be placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The article follows:

THE NEW PANAMA CANAL TREATIES: A POTENTIAL DIPLOMATIC PEARL HARBORS

(By Luis Kutner)

The New Panama Canal treaties have become the subject of one of the most emotional political debates in years, perhaps the most controversial issue since the Vietnam

War.[1] It has been described as an issue which touches "the nerve endings of American citizens" as few issues ever have.[2] At the heart of the controversy is the 1903 Hay/Bunau-Varilla Treaty[3] under which the Canal was built—and which the new treaties replace,[4] for it is the source of the major issue of debate here: the sovereignty question.[5] Thus, in order to fully understand this and other related issues involved, we must first understand the historical events that led up to the treaty of 1903.[6]

Interest on the part of the United States in building a Panama canal, out of recognition of the strategic importance of this area in Central America (just as the Spanish had recognized it centuries before when Balboa crossed the Isthmus to discover the Pacific Ocean), came about as early as 1821, at the time Panama signed a formal agreement declaring independence from Spain and unified with Colombia then called New Granada).[7] Five years later Henry Clay, as Secretary of State, publicly stated that he favored construction of such a canal across Panama[8] to extend trans-isthmian transit "to all parts of the globe upon the payment of just compensation and reasonable tolls."[9]

What might be called the first basic Panama Canal treaty[10] was negotiated in 1846 with New Granada by the U.S. Minister there, Benjamin A. Bidlack, and was subsequently ratified in 1848.[11] Under the terms of this "Treaty of Peace, Amity, Navigation, and Commerce"[12] New Granada agreed to grant to the U.S. a "free and open" transit or right of way "across the Isthmus of Panama" via any "modes of communication that now exist, or that may be, hereafter, constructed" in exchange for a U.S. guarantee to protect New Granada's territorial integrity within its province of Panama. President Polk, in his submission of the Mallarino-Bidlack Treaty for Senate ratification, emphasized its advantages to American commerce in that such a Panamanian passage would shorten the route to "our possessions on the northwest coast of America," as well as to Asia. The year after the treaty was ratified, a New York company began to build a railway across Panama that was completed in 1855. This first trans-continental railroad was also the first specific step toward the construction of the Panama Canal.[13]

By the 1850s, however, the U.S. had cause to worry about the efforts of a stronger naval and commercial rival, the British, who were seeking to establish a protectorate over all of Central America and, thereby, obtain control over any ship canal in that region. So, to prevent such a monopoly, the U.S. entered into a cooperative agreement with the English, known as the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, to share equally in the construction, operation, and defense of any such canal to be built in the future. Although later Presidents and Congresses came to feel that this country should have a canal solely under American control rather than sharing it with England, the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty remained in force until the turn of the century, attempts to negotiate an end to it before that time having failed. In 1901 England finally consented to give up its claims to the U.S. and terminate the pact. In its place, the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty allowed the U.S. a free hand in building, controlling, and fortifying an isthmian canal.[14] This treaty of 1901 gave to the United States "the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal" when completed and set certain guidelines for the canal's operation[15] (such as being "open to the vessels . . . of all nations," similar to the "free navigation" rule for the Suez Canal under the 1888 Constantinople Convention).[16] The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty is still operative today[17] and, hence, remains legally obligatory on both Britain and the U.S.,[18] "the High Contracting Parties under the . . . Treaty."[19]

The emergence of the U.S. from the Spanish-American War as a power in the Caribbean and Pacific had generated new enthusiasm for an isthmian canal, since a water passage now seemed essential if America was to take full advantage of the trade opportunities that had opened-up to it in the Pacific.[20] Thus it was that in the year after Hay-Pauncefote was ratified President Theodore Roosevelt, under authority provided by Congress through the Spooner Act, took steps to acquire from Colombia "perpetual" control of a strip of land at least six miles across the Isthmus of Panama, still a part of Colombia, in order to construct a canal. A Columbian representative, Herran, agreed in 1903 to give the U.S. a six-mile-wide zone for a $10 million dollar cash payment, plus another payment of $250,000 annually to Colombia. But the government at Bogata rejected the proposed treaty because it felt the money offered was insufficient and it feared the agreement would seriously impinge on Colombian sovereignty in the Province of Panama.[21]

Panama itself now saw an opportunity to attain its goal of independence which it had been unsuccessfully seeking ever since Colombia had revoked its autonomy.[22] The Panamanians had made 53 previous attempts to gain independence;[23] all failed. On several occasions the U.S. landed troops in Panama, in accord with the Bidlack Treaty, to help Colombia put down the revolts. But this time President Roosevelt was angered at the rejection of the canal treaty by Colombia, which the U.S. had always supported in the past; he now referred to the Colombians as "the blackmailers of Bogota." So, when Panamanian nationalists again revolted in 1903, Roosevelt had the U.S.S. Nashville present in the Isthmus waters off Colon, Panama. This protective gunboat provided indirect encouragement to the Panamanian insurrectionists in that the show of force by the U.S. Navy kept Colombian troops and ships from suppressing the rebellion. It was a bloodless revolution in which Panama declared its independence and formed the Republic of Panama. The new government was quickly recognized by the U.S., which was also to protect the new country against its former master.[24]

Roosevelt was later to boast "I took Panama,"[25] which is certainly more of an admission than a defense of his own action here. But Roosevelt did not foment the revolution,[26] the fervor for separation from Columbia having been deeply rooted in Panama. Nonetheless, this "gunboat" diplomacy of the U.S. did help Panama to become the independent nation it is today.[27]

Almost immediately after the establishment and recognition by the U.S. of Panama, negotiations began on a canal treaty between the two nations.[28] The Panamanian government authorized Phillipe Bunau-Varilla to act as its Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary in negotiating the treaty.[29] The negotiations concluded in the Hay/Bunau-Varilla Treaty to govern administration, operation, and control over the canal and its zone,[30] a strip of land 10 miles long granted to the U.,S. "in perpetuity" by Panama.[31] The treaty draft was signed on November 15, 1903,[32] at 7 o'clock p.m.—hardly "in the dead of night," as President Carter would have the American people believe.[33] Later, on December 4, 1903, the formal signing took place, with the three members of Panama's junta and six Panamanian cabinet members as signatories to the treaty.[34] The treaty was subsequently ratified by Panama in February of the following year,[35] and in May, after ratifications had been exchanged, the Foreign Minister of Panama notified our government that his country considered its jurisdiction over that area of land within the Canal Zone to have ceased.[36]

In exchange for the right to occupy this zone and build a canal therein, the U.S. initially paid Panama $10 million for this transfer of territory—a cost far exceeding the purchase price of the Louisiana District or Alaska, or, for that matter, any other such territorial acquisition. In addition, the U.S. acquired complete ownership of all parcels of privately-owned land wthin the Zone by paying every individual land-owner or squatter for title to their land in fee simple; all deed instruments were recorded and became a part of official U.S. court records. Further, $40 million was paid to a defunct private French company for whatever rights they had to the ditch they had begun to dig in an earlier attempt (from 1881 to 1889) to build a canal; the tremendous cost of construction had forced the French company into bankruptcy which rendered it incapable of completing its project. The total acquisition costs at this point were over $54 million for the U.S.[37]

Further still, as an aid in the construction of the canal, the U.S. assumed a $250,000 annual obligation previously paid by a private railroad company for the right-of-way of a rail line it had built across the Isthmus. Out of agreement in the Hay/Bunau-Varilla Treaty arose the misconception that the U.S. was paying Panama for renting the Zone.[38] Indeed, in his television speech on the new Panama Canal treaties, President Carter claimed that the U.S. has to "pay rent" to Panama in order to "use their land."[39] Yet there is no specific language in Hay/Bunau-Varilla which even hints that the Canal Zone is a leasehold, and neither Panama nor the U.S. has accepted the idea that the annual annuity (since incresed to $1,500,000) is an obligation on a lease for use.[40] Moreover, while the term "lease" is nowhere to be found in the treaty, the term "grant" is used no less than 14 times and, since the grant was "in perpetuity," there is no provision for renegotiation or termination as might be found in a lease agreement. The transfer of territory seems specific and absolute. The boundaries of the Canal Zone, in implementation of the treaty, were first defined through a provisional agreement, ratified by Panama's National Assembly; by that agreement Panama specifically "ceded" the land to the U.S., and the boundary lines were made permanent upon the completion of the canal.[41]

After ten years involving American financing, engineering, and other resources, the building of the Panama Canal had finally been accomplished by 1914 at an outlay of some $387 thousand tax monies.[42] In the early 1920s the U.S. finally reached an agreement with the disgruntled Colombian government to compensate it in the amount of $25 million for the loss of its Panamanian province; in return, Colombia officially recognized the independence of Panama and that the title to the Canal Zone rested "entirely and completely" with the U.S. Over the past seven decades the U.S. has invested almost $2 billion in the Canal Zone, including ridding this once mosquito-infested jungle of malaria.[43]

The foregoing historical summary of the Panama Canal and the original treaty with Panama has been necessary not only to understand the arguments made for turning the Canal over to Panama, but to refute those arguments as well. It has certainly shown that, in terms of Article II of the 1903 treaty, the U.S. clearly has "control" of the Canal Zone "in perpetuity."[44] The U.S. surely has ownership of the Canal Zone,[45] and the moral and legal right—the root of all property rights—of a creator in that which it has created: the Canal itself.[46]

Sovereignty, however, should not be confused with ownership. Sovereignty is supreme and independent authority; it is the right to make decisions not subject to the approval of others; hence, the ultimate exercise of power over a territory. As it pertains to the Panama Canal Zone, it would include the management, operation, and defense of the Canal.[47] Without such sovereignty, the U.S. would have no rights at all in the Canal Zone.[48] Of course, the U.S. does have sovereignty in the Zone, and the sovereign rights it has been exercising were received through the treaty of 1903,[49] to wit:

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power and authority within the Zone . . . which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power or authority.[50] (Emphasis added.)

Of the two new treaties, the basic one surrenders all U.S. sovereign rights over the Canal Zone to Panama.[51] The preamble acknowledges "Panama's sovereignty" and Article I(a) abrogates the 1903 convention, which will be replaced by this new treaty six months after the exchange of ratification instruments by both nations. On that effective date of the treaty, Panama assumes general territorial jurisdiction over the Zone; and, at noon on December 31, 1999, Panama further assumes control of Canal operations and defense as U.S. military presence ceases.[52] This negotiated transfer of sovereignty [53] repudiates a 75-year-old legal understanding.[54]

Although sovereignty cannot be transferred unless one exercises it to begin with,[55] proponents of the new treaties have advanced the claim that the U.S. never had full sovereignty over the Canal Zone, but was merely given certain "rights" by the original 1903 treaty.[56] In so doing, the proponents have adopted an argument almost as old as the Hay/Bunau-Varilla Treaty itself. Some have always felt that the U.S. was never meant to be the ultimate sovereign, with titular, or residual, sovereignty retained by Panama. This question of who holds sovereignty revolves around Article III of the 1903 treaty, cited above. Those who adhere to the notion of titular sovereignty read the phrase "if it were sovereign" (emphasis added) as a qualification on the Article II grant. Yet when the final words of Article III denying Panama "the exercise * * * of any * * * sovereign right, power or authority" are taken in the context of the entire article, it offers proof that the U.S. is sovereign in the Canal Zone. Still, the sovereignty debate goes on today.[57] Indeed, U.S. Ambassador At-Large Ellsworth Bunker (who helped negotiate the new agreements with Panama) spoke of Panama's "titular sovereignty over the Zone" in a speech to the World Affairs Council.[58] But John Hay, Secretary of State at the time the 1903 treaty was signed, dismissed the theory of titular sovereignty as a "barren scepter." [59]

The courts entered the sovereignty debate as early as 1907.[60] In that year the U.S. Supreme Court interpreted the Hay/Bunau-Varilla Treaty as "ceding the Canal Zone" to the U.S. in the case of Wilson v. Shaw.[61] Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for a unanimous Court, refused to accept plaintiff's contention that the U.S. had not acquired title to and the exercise of sovereignty over the Canal Zone in the absence of described boundaries in the treaty; he forthrightly declared:

"It is hypercritical to contend that * * * the territory * * * does not belong to this nation, because of the omission of the technical terms used in the ordinary conveyance of real estate. * * *" [62]

And Justice Brewer stated further that disputes "as to the exact boundary on either side" were not infrequent in the "cessions of territory" and, thus, "immaterial," adding, by way of comparison, that—

Alaska was ceded to us 40 years ago, but the boundary between it and the English possessions were not settled until within the last two or three years. Yet no one ever doubted the title of this Republic to Alaska."[63]

The opinion in the Shaw decision is especially interesting in light of President Carter's assurances to the public in his fireside chat of February 1, 1978, that the Supreme Court has "repeatedly acknowledged the sovereignty of Panama over the Canal Zone" and that "(t)he Canal Zone cannot be compared with United States territory. We bought Alaska from the Russians. * * *" [64]

The Supreme Court again addressed the sovereignty issue in regard to Article III of Hay/Bunau-Varilla nine years after it had decided. Shaw. Here the plaintiffs sought an injunction to restrain the defendants from seizing plaintiffs' property in the Canal Zone for public use so as to prevent dispossession of the owners until they received the compensation required by the Panamanian constitution. The plaintiff's contended that inhabitants of the Canal Zone had not lost any of these constitutional guarantees under the 1903 treaty with the U.S. The Court, though, ruled, in affirming the Canal Zone District Court, "that where a government by treaty, parts with sovereignty of a part of its possessions, . . . the new sovereignty is equally empowered to legislate therefor without regard to pre-existing laws or conditions." [65]

To be sure, Congress had previously provided in the Panama Canal Act of 1912 [66] that the Zone was to "be considered . . . an organized territory of the United States" for purposes of extradition.[67] Later in the Luckenbach case,[68] the Supreme Court determined that the Canal Zone was a "foreign port" as it related to the setting of rates for mail carriage—but, clearly, only for this purpose of mail transportation. The Court here cited the Wilson v. Shaw precedent and chose not to examine the sovereignty issue further.[69] When a defendant accused of committing a wrong in the Canal Zone subsequently sought in a New York case [70] to dismiss the complaint of the ground that the Zone was, in reliance upon Luckenbach, a foreign country where that court had no jurisdiction, the court itself denied the motion to dismiss, noting that Luckenbach involved special circumstances: i.e., ports relating to the mails; it did not involve places.[71] Moreover, a British court even took note of the special circumstances involved in the Luckenbach holding when it found the Canal Zone to be a U.S. possession and, consequently, the town of Cristobal within the Zone to be a U.S. port for the carriage of goods by sea.[72]

Divergent opinions on the sovereignty question are seen in a 1948 Supreme Court case. Mr. Justice Reed observed that the Canal Zone was a territory of the U.S., but then added, rather inconsistently, that it was "territory over which we do not have sovereignty." [73] Albeit dictum, Mr. Justice Jackson dissented from that dictum, saying:

"To such an extent, indeed, are we sovereign in the Canal Zone that Panama has been granted special commercial rights only by express and formal concession, and this Court has reviewed the history of the acquisition and concluded that the title of the United States is complete and perfect." [74]

The most recent Supreme Court decision on the status of the Panama Canal Zone was handed-down in 1972.[75] The Court upheld the ruling of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals which declared that "(t)he Canal Zone is an unincorporated territory of the United States over which Congress exercises 'complete and plenary authority'." [76] This case not only referred to the 1903 treaty but also to the treaty of 1936, which stated that the Canal Zone was a "territory of . . . Panama under the jurisdiction of the United States . . ." [77] and which the State Department now claims recognized the sovereignty of Panama over the Zone.[78]

The treaty signed in 1936 (Hull-Alfaro), the first substantial revision of the 1903 treaty, took 40 months to ratify. Negotiated under the administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt as a part of his "Good Neighbor" policy, the treaty made a number of concessions in order to improve relations with Panama. The annual annuity was raised to 430,000 devalued dollars, and the U.S. relinquished, at the request of Panama, its guarantee of that nation's independence, along with its right to intervene in Panama's affairs by maintaining order in those Panamanian cities located near the Atlantic and Pacific entrances of the Canal. More important, though, were the elimination of the United States' right under the original treaty to use any defense sites it required outside the Zone and a provision that the defense of the Canal would become the joint responsibility of the U.S. and Panama. The Army at first opposed the new pact. Given the growing effectiveness of the airplane, the defense of the Canal had to depend on fighter planes and bombers based outside the Zone, in addition to large fixed guns and a mobile Navy. There was also some fear of the expanding Japanese fleet. Finally, in 1939, three years after the treaty had been signed, the strongly Democrat-controlled Senate ratified it on a largely party-line vote—but not before there was included an exchange of notes making it clear that the U.S. had both the right to take unilateral steps to defend the Canal when a sudden crisis precluded joint consultation and to hold military maneuvers outside the Zone if such operations were warranted for the security of the waterway.[79]

Although both the Panamanian Foreign Minister and Ambassador told then-Undersecretary of State Sumner Welles that their country was so satisfied with what it had received from the 1936 treaty it would not request any further concessions, more concessions were later granted to Panama through another treaty revision in 1955 as a result of a prior meeting between President Eisenhower and President Remon of Panama at Washington. The new agreement, signed in Panama, again increased the annuity, this time to $1.9 million; it also sought to ameliorate inequities in wage rates for similar work performed by Americans and Panamanians alike in the Canal Zone. In return, Panama was to permit the U.S. to establish military bases, which the U.S. had paid Panama the price of about $1 billion to obtain during World War II to be evacuated within a year after the war ended. Panama had also wanted the U.S. to rescind the "perpetuity" clause of the 1903 treaty for a 99 year concession to the Canal Zone instead. However, this right the U.S. refused to relinquish.[80] As a matter of fact, the 1955 treaty reconfirmed our rights and sovereignty in the Zone.[81] Perhaps, the lesson of current events had not been lost here. In 1953 Egypt had unilaterally abrogated British rights to maintain a base at Suez and station troops along the canal route. The next year the United Kingdom itself renounced its treaty rights and promised to remove its armed forces within 20 months.[82] Then in 1956, a month after the British had withdrawn from the Suez Canal, Egypt nationalized the Suez Canal Company and kept the profits. It also kept the Canal closed to Israeli ships in spite of treaty commitments, an Anglo-French attack, and a U.S. condemnation.[83]

Although a decided shift in U.S. policy on the sovereignty of the Canal Zone can be clearly detected in the State Department since the Suez Crisis of 1956, one of the first symbolic actions occurred a decade earlier when Alger Hiss, a Communist agent at that time heading the Department's Office of Political Affairs, included the Canal Zone on a list of "U.S.-occupied territories" which he sent to the newly-created United Nations. His action was supported by Secretary of State Dean Acheson.[84]

From 1959 to 1964 the growing demand that the U.S. acknowledge Panama's claim of sovereignty over the Canal Zone, led to outbursts of violence. In 1959 a mob of several hundred student rioters attacked the U.S. Embassy in Panama City and ripped down our flag, then attempted to invade the Canal Zone, intent on planting the Panamanian flag at several locations in Zone territory. To placate the Panamanians, President Eisenhower reacted the following year by ordering that their flag be flown at the Shaler Triangle located within the Zone. The government of Panama took this action as symbolic recognition of its residual sovereignty over the Canal Zone. although Congress, by resolution, had advised Eisenhower that it opposed the flag concession. President Kennedy later authorized flying the Panamanian flag at 17 different locations in the Zone.[85]

A far more serious disturbance exploded early in 1964 when Panamanian street mobs, consisting of members of communistic parties in Panama and Cuba led by persons communist-trained in political action, rioted along the Canal Zone border. Four U.S. soldiers and over 20 Panamanians were killed in the bloodshed; 700 persons were wounded and more than 200 seriously injured; property damage was estimated to be over $2 million. The Panama National Guard took no steps whatever to stop the rioters—and, in fact, some guardsmen even took part in the riot themselves, using their weapons against American troops and sniping at targets in the Zone. As a result of this incident, and at the insistence of the State Department that the Canal Zone really was the sovereign territory of Panama, President Lyndon Johnson near the end of the year publicly committed the U.S. to negotiate a new, fixed-term canal treaty with Panama.[86] The terms of this treaty were to be similar to the subsequent statement of principles found in the Kissinger-Tack Agreement of 1974, which implied that the Canal Zone was Panamanian territory.[87] As a Congressman, Gerald Ford expressed concern over such a treaty, noting that "(w)ith Cuba under the control of the Soviets through its puppet Castro and with increased communistic subversion in South America, a communistic threat to the Panama Canal is clearly a grave danger. . . ." [88] Yet, as President, Ford endorsed the reversion of U.S. sovereignty over the Canal Zone to Panama.[89]

The process of treaty negotiations started with Panama by President Johnson were concluded under President Carter.[90] The details of the treaties, written in secret, were kept secret from Congress and the American people until 24 hours before they were signed.[91] Mr. Carter staged the ceremonial signing of the treaties with Panama's dictator, Omar Torrijos, at Washington on September 7, 1977. Whereupon Gov. Meldrim Thomson of New Hampshire declared September 7 to be a "Second Day of Infamy." [92] To be sure, the new Panama Canal treaties hold all the potential of a diplomatic Pearl Harbor.

The national defense is one of the legitimate purposes of government—and it is of the highest order when it comes to preserving freedom. Foremost to any defense policy is the capability to use and control the seas if a nation's freedom is challenged. That is surely vital to the security of the United States.[93] Especially critical to the defense interests of the U.S. is the Caribbean area.[94] Strategic control of the Caribbean in both war and peace has been essential to U.S. security ever since the Monroe Doctrine was enunciated. That security has already been weakened by the communization of Cuba, 90 miles off our shore. Abandoning sovereignty over the Panama Canal and its Zone will further threaten U.S. security.[95]

The Canal Zone has almost uniformly been included as a part of the U.S. in matters relating to the national defense and security,[96] and there can be no doubt that the Canal itself is quite necessary to U.S. security and defense.[97] Indeed, the Canal, as an inter-ocean waterway, has grown more important than ever to the U.S. today. Soviet sea power is expanding throughout the world, based on a naval doctrine of cutting-off U.S. lines of sea communication.[98] With the Communists out to dominate or influence global maritime "choke points." [99] future control of the Panama Canal Zone is a real concern [100] since the Canal is one of those choke points. [101] Moreover, even as the Soviet Navy has expanded, the U.S. Navy is shrinking to the point where it is currently out-numbered in submarines and surface ships by the Soviets. This reduction in the size and power of the U.S. Navy's active fleet means that, while it may have a two-ocean responsibility, the U.S. does not really have a two-ocean Navy; it is a one-ocean Navy, at best one-and-a-half. Thus the great need of the Panama Canal to the U.S. Navy is readily apparent. In order to compensate for the limited adequacy of its combat elements, the Navy must obtain maximum combat effectiveness. Moving naval ships, personnel, and supplies between the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans through a shorter route with greater speed and quicker response time enables the Navy, with a steady flow of logistic support, to meet a sudden crisis or conflict. For example, during the Cuban Missile Crisis, Marines and supplies from the West Coast were ferried through the Panama Canal.[102] Acknowledging the Canal as an essential defense link between the Atlantic and Pacific, General V. H. Krulac, U.S. Marine Corps (ret.), has said that "(i)t is only because of the waterway that we are able to risk having what amounts to a bare-bones, one-ocean Navy." [103]

In making for an effective U.S. Navy in both oceans, every naval vessel now on active duty (including nuclear-powered, ballistic-missile firing submarines, attack subs, combat surface ships, and support and supply ships for aircraft carriers) can transit the Panama Canal, save for 13 of our largest carriers—too large to pass through the present locks. However, the trend in naval shipbuilding is toward smaller, though more effective, ships; and well before the year 2000 these new, smaller-sized ships will have begun to replace those larger crafts.[104]

Although there is overwhelming agreement among the majority of high-ranking military experts on the strategic importance of the Canal to U.S. security, there is still disagreement over ratification of the new treaties.[105] The Joint Chiefs of Staff support for ratification is understandable. Secretary of Defense Harold Brown has stated that any of the Joint Chiefs who opposed the treaties should resign.[106] Obviously, any officer on active duty who does not wish to jeopardize his military career will simply adhere to the views of those over them.[107] However, retired Admiral Thomas H. Moorer told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that "(a) large majority of our war and contingency plans are totally infeasible unless one assumes that full priority use of the Canal will be available." [108] And, appearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee to oppose the disposal of the Panama Canal by reason of the fact that its "defense and use . . . is wrapped unextricably with the overall global strategy of the United States," [109] Moorer concluded:

" . . . A maritime link between the Atlantic the Pacific is vital to the security of the United States and will always be so. * * * A permanent U.S. presence will provide the best defense and the best insurance against a major conflict in the Caribbean area." [110]

Together with three other former Chiefs of Naval Operations (Admirals Arleigh Burke, Robert Carney, and George Armstrong), Moorer had earlier written to President Carter on the importance of "this interoceanic waterway." Drawing on their own experiences in active service, the admirals emphasized the strategic value of the Panama Canal. "As Commander-in-Chief," they informed Mr. Carter, "you will find the ownership and sovereign control of the Canal indispensable during periods of tension and conflict." The four also warned of an "existing military threat," noting the "close ties" the present regime in Panama had with Cuba, "which in turn is closely tied to the Soviet Union"; and they cautioned the President further that "the loss of the Canal . . . a serious set-back in war, would contribute to the encirclement of the United States by hostile naval forces and threaten our ability to survive." [111]

Nevertheless, President Carter asked the Senate to aprove the two new Panama Canal treaties that would relinquish U.S. control over this most strategic of waterways in the world to a pro-communist country. Upon implementation of the treaties only four of the 14 U.S. military bases presently in the Canal Zone will remain and these bases willl come under the direct civil and political jurisdiction of Panama even before the U.S. is technically scheduled to leave in 1999, since sovereignty over the Zone passes to Panama with treaty ratification.[112] While paragraph 2 of Article IV in the basic Canal treaty grants to the U.S. the "primary responsibility" to protect and defend the Canal "(f)or the duration" of that treaty (or until December 31, 1999), it is contradicted by paragraph 1, which gives both the U.S. and Panama an equal role in the protection and defense of the Canal "from an armed attack or other actions which threaten . . . (its) security . . ."; under those circumstances Panama could thwart any U.S. defense effort. After 1999, when the basic treaty expires and the U.S. no longer has any bases, troops, or other forms of military presence or power in the Isthmus to prevent a blocking of the Canal, only the second treaty, the so-called "Neutrality Treaty," will remain in effect. Just what defense role the U.S. will then have in upholding its interests in the Canal is unclear due to the vaguely-worded treaty itself, particularly Article IV.[113]

The language of Article IV of the Neutrality Treaty is as ambiguous as that of Article VI in the first treaty, posing problems of interpretation.[114] The possibility of differences or variations between the language used in the English and Spanish texts of the treaty could well alter the meaning of the provisions and create a controversy relating to the interpretation of key clauses in this document.[115] The controversy over Article IV is whether or not the U.S. has the right of intervention to protect the Canal's neutrality.[116] The Carter Administration claims that Article IV guarantees the U.S. permanent and unilateral legal right to re-intervene and take whatever steps it deems necessary in order to ensure the Canal's neutrality and open access if it is subject to an attack or closure by hostile forces—even if that threat comes internally from Panama. That planation has been flatly rejected publicly by Torrijos and the Panamanian treaty negotiators, who assert that the U.S. has the right to defend the Canal only if it is threatened by a foreign power and Panama requests assistance against the aggression; the treaty "does not say," in the words of Panama's chief negotiator, Dr. Romulo Escobar Bethancourt, "that it falls to the United States to decide when neutrality is violated or not." [117] What Article IV actually states is merely that the U.S. and Panama—

"agree to maintain the regime of neutrality established in this Treaty, which shall be maintained in order that the Canal shall remain permanently neutral . . .".[118]

This is extremely ambiguous and imprecise. But it was deliberately intended to be so because neither U.S. nor Panamanian negotiators seemed willing to give up their respective positions on the right of intervention—although Escobar, in a speech to the Panamanian General Assembly on August 19, 1977, reported that the U.S. "gave up on the idea of its having a guarantee of neutrality over the Canal," just as Bunker insisted, "Our own military defense options are not restricted. We will be free to defend the canal's neutrality as now. . . ." It is all very confusing, to be sure.[119] In the case of disputes over treaty interpretation, reconciliation of differences is provided for through consultation or, perhaps, mediation—a tacit acknowledgement that both interpretations legally have the same weight or validity.[120]

At least one thing is clear about this neutrality treaty: it would force the U.S. to give free passage through the Canal to nations at war with it or its allies. Article II provides that in time of war the Canal "shall remain open to peaceful transit by vessels of all nations," and Article III, section 1(e), specifically adds that "vessels of war of all nations shall . . . be entitled to transit the Canal" without being required to submit to inspection, search, or surveillance. It is certainly not a reassuring thought to have the U.S. committed, for example, to allowing Soviet ships and submarines to peacefully pass through the Canal when we might be at war with Russia.[121]

In an attempt to eliminate the ambiguities over the right of the U.S. to defend the Panama Canal under the Neutrality Treaty, Torrijos met with Carter at the White House on October 15, 1977, and the two issued a joint "Statement of Understanding" on what Article IV was supposed to mean. The statement indicates that the U.S. has the right to act against any "threat directed against the Canal," yet at the same time it does not permit the U.S. the right of intervention in the "internal affairs" of Panama, violating its territorial integrity. Thus, should the U.S. intervene to protect the Canal, which was then a part of Panama, it would have to intervene in Panama's internal affairs. So, the ambiguities persist [122]—even though President Carter has proclaimed, on the basis of the statement of understanding, that the U.S. "can take whatever military action is necessary to make sure the Canal always remains open and safe." [123]

Still the Carter-Torrijos statement is nothing more than a personal interpretation on the part of these principals. It does not change the treaty language [124] nor the contractural relationship between parties to the treaty. As a statement of "understanding," it merely explains a position on a given matter in the treaty; it is only a tangent to the treaty's basic operation.[125] Because such a statement is not part of a treaty, it has no binding effect on the parties under international law.[126] The real understanding of a treaty will be limited to the very language in the treaty itself.[127] Hence, in the event the U.S. found it necessary to intervene for whatever reason, only the treaty language would count—and this particular treaty conveys no specific right of intervention to the U.S. at all.[128] Moreover, neither Carter nor Torrijos signed their statement of understanding (a fact Torrijos later boasted about) and it remains entirely informal.[129] While adding the substance of the understanding to the treaty via a Senate amendment makes it formal,[130] this only begs a fundamental question: if the Panama Canal is vital enough to the freedom and security of the American people that we want the right to send U.S. forces back there after it is turned over to Panama, then why shouldn't we hang on to it in the first place?

It has been said that approval of the treaties will remove an age-old irritant to U.S.-Panamanian relations and buy the goodwill of the people of Panama, thereby avoiding future violence.[131] Indeed, Defense Secretary Brown admitted to an audience in Phoenix, Arizona, that the treaties had to be accepted in order to keep Panama as a friend.[132] About this whole transaction there is an implication of blackmail diplomacy. Even though the opponents of the new Panama Canal treaties would like better relations with Panama, how absurd it would be strategically to surrender our rights to operate and defend the Canal into the hands of a potential enemy.[133] Making such a major concession as this will only compound the errors of our past policies.

If, after a series of defeats and retreats from the Bay of Pigs to Vietnam, there is somewhere the U.S. is going to stand steadfast and draw a line beyond which it adversaries, who, as Solyzhenitsyn warns, are out to destroy it, will not cross, then the Panama Canal must be that place.[134]

The Republic of Panama originally ceded to the United States by treaty territory running through the heart of that country for the purpose of constructing a canal, and within that territory the U S. did, indeed, construct such a canal wholly at its own cost. Panama also conferred upon the U.S. the necessary sovereignty and jurisdiction over the Canal Zone occupied by this world canal enabling the U.S. to maintain, operate, and protect it. That the U.S. enjoys the absolute right of ownership and control of the Canal has been decided by the Supreme Court. This should satisfy those who feel that titular sovereignty is at least reserved to Panama In conclusion, it is the view of this writer that the U.S. should not abandon the Panama Canal and give back the sovereignty over the Canal Zone to Panama.[135]

The 1955 treaty also provided for the disposition of some property in the Canal Zone to Panama, but required implementing legislation by Congress for the transfer in accord with the Federal Constitution. Article IV, Section 3, clause 2, of the Constitution empowers Congress "to dispose of . . . the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States." One of the Framers, Randolph of Virginia, stated that this was "a most express restriction" on the treaty-making authority, serving as a check against sacrificing the nation's property rights to a foreign power without consideration by both houses of Congress. In Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258 (1890), the Court said that "a treaty, which purported to exercise power exclusively granted to Congress would require implementing legislation." Courts have repeatedly ruled that the Article IV grant of authority to act on the disposal of public territory is an exclusive power of the full Congress to which all other power over property is subordinate in such cases as Wisconsin Central R.R. Co. v. Price County, 133 U.S. 496 (1890), and Sioux Tribe v. U.S., 316 U.S. 317 (1942). Unfortunately, the basic new Panama Canal treaty conveys U.S. property to Panama sans any such joint congressional action, thus by-passing the constitutional role and right of the House of Representatives in disposing of federal property interests. Kenneth Merlin, "Panama—The Constitutional Question," printed in Cong. Rec. (Feb. 7, 1978), at pp. 2660–61; remarks by Sen. Goldwater, Cong. Rec. [135] On March 16th, 1978 with only one vote to spare, the Senate yesterday approved the first of two Panama Canal treaties, saving President Carter from a potentially devastating defeat. The vote, one of those few tallies likely to go down in the history books, was 68 to 32. Treaty opponents immediately vowed a full scale effort to defeat the other canal treaty, which provides for a gradual turnover of the canal to Panama during the next 22 years. The opponents professed optimism about their chances to kill the second treaty on which the Senate is expected to vote next month. Reaching into Shakespeare for allusions to Brutus and Cassius at the battle of Philippi, Senate Majority Leader Robert Byrd declared: "The Rubicon of decision on the treaty is now to be crossed." ●

PETITIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following petitions, which were referred as indicated:

POM–583. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Finance:

"HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 372

"Whereas, until 1972, the investment income of state and local public pension plans were implicitly exempt from federal taxation and former public employees receiving public pension benefits were allowed preferential tax treatement whether the plans were qualified or not; and

"Whereas, although there are no explicit statutes providing the exemption or nonqualified preferential tax treatment, Congress was aware of and the U.S. Internal Revenue Service (IRS) practiced this implicit exemption and authority; and

"Whereas, since 1972, however, the IRS has changed its policy and chose to ignore the implicit exemption and authority; thus, some public pension plans have become subject to the qualification requirements and taxation of investment income; and

"Whereas, furthermore, in 1977, the IRS stated its intention of requiring public pension plans, whether qualified or not, to file annual returns containing certain financial information; and

"Whereas, these policies are unacceptable to state and local governments; and

"Whereas, besides the financial impact on the public pension plans and former public employees, the National Conference of State Legislatures, in a policy paper representing the consensus of state and local governments, states that the policies are contrary to Congressional intent and the doctrine of sovereignty of states; and

"Whereas, the policy paper states that Congress has had ample opportunity to make explicit statutory amendments subjecting public pension plans to federal requirements; and that the lack of such statutes indicate Congress's approval of the implicit exemption; and

"Whereas, the policy paper further states that even if Congress had specifically subjected public pension plans to federal requirements, it is questionable, under the doctrine of state sovereignty, whether the federal government has the constitutional right or power to regulate intrastate public employee benefits or to tax state and local governments; and

"Whereas, the 95th Congress is currently considering two bills, H.R. 9118 and S. 1587, which would specifically exempt public pension plans from federal taxation and reporting requirements; now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Ninth Legislature of the State of Hawaii, Regular Session of 1978, that Congress and the President are requested to enact either H.R. 9118 or S. 1587 into law; and

"Be it further resolved that certified copies of this Resolution be transmitted to the Honorable Jimmy Carter, President of the United States, Senator James O. Eastland, President Pro Tempore of the U.S. Senate, Senator Robert Byrd, Majority Leader of the U.S. Senate, Senate Howard Baker, Minority Floor Leader of the U.S. Senate, Representative Thomas P. O'Neill, Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, Representative James C. Wright, Majority Leader of the U.S. House of Representatives, Representative John J. Rhodes, Minority Leader of the U.S. House of Representatives, and to each member of Hawaii's congressional delegation."

POM–584. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 11

"Whereas, the United States Congress currently has under consideration proposed legislation on a national energy policy which relates to the regulation of public utilities across the country; and

"Whereas, many states have unique regulatory problems, particularly the State of Hawaii because of its geographic location and climatic conditions; and

"Whereas, state regulatory commissions across the country, in general, and the State of Hawaii Public Utilities Commission, in particular, appear to be doing a competent job because they are able to adapt to the special regulatory problems of their respective geographic areas and one set of regulatory standards for the entire country would seem totally impractical; and

"Whereas, the U.S. Senate and House conferees have reached a tentative conference agreement on the Public Utility Energy Policies Act, which establishes a national energy policy relating to the regulation of public utilities; and

"Whereas, under such Act, federal standards for electric utility rate structures are enumerated and the Act states that these standards must be considered by state regulatory commissions; and

"Whereas, the Secretary of Energy is authorized under the Act to intervene in state regulatory proceedings to raise the issue of one or more of the enumerated federal standards as well as other concepts which contribute to the purposes of the Act; and

"Whereas, the proposed Act, as agreed to by the U.S. Senate and House conferees, already represents a certain degree of federal preemption of state public utility regulatory authority; and

"Whereas, further federal preemption would result in a serious infringement upon state legislative responsibility in matters which have historically been deemed best left to the attention of individual states and would completely undermine the rights currently reserved to the states, including the State of Hawaii; now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the Ninth Legislature of the State of Hawaii, Regular Session of 1978, the House of Representatives concurring, that the United States Congress is requested to refrain from any further federal preemption of the regulation of public utilities, thus allowing the Hawaii Public Utilities Commission to carry out the responsibilities delegated to it by the Legislature of the State of Hawaii; and

"Be it further resolved that certified copies of this Concurrent Resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of Hawaii's delegation to the United States Congress."

POM–585. A resolution adopted by the City Council of San Diego, California, relative to deferred compensation; to the Committee on Finance.

PRODUCT AND PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY INSURANCE TAX EQUITY ACT OF 1978

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today, with my colleague Senator BAYH, the Product and Professional Liability Insurance Tax Equity Act. This legislation is designed to end Federal tax discrimination against individuals or companies that self-insure for professional and product liability. This bill was first introduced during the last session of the Congress by Congressman CHARLES WHALEN and six colleagues to address problems encountered by manufacturers with costly liability insurance premiums. This legislation has received the bipartisan backing of 63 Members of the House, and has been endorsed by 45 national trade and professional associations.

Last week the Commerce Department announced proposals that came out of its 2-year task force study into the growing problems involving product liability. Commerce proposed a liability insurance plan similar to my bill in that it provides a tax break for businesses which establish self-insurance reserve funds. The Commerce Department accurately cites the issue of product liability as "a problem of national importance that must be addressed."

A study by Congressman WHALEN revealed that of those companies that want to obtain product liability insurance coverage, approximately one out of five said that they either cannot afford it or cannot find an insurance carrier willing to sell it to them. The study also found that the average increase in product liability costs, for those who were able to obtain coverage, was 944 percent in the period since 1970. The average increase in sales volume for the same company for the same period was 162 percent. Hence, premiums grew at a rate 5.8 times greater than sales.

This study, presented last year to the House Small Business Committee, concluded that one out of every three companies surveyed said that they have been forced to increase the price they charged for at least one product line as a direct consequence of increased product liability premiums. The report also revealed that one out of every six firms surveyed had been forced to abandon at least one product line as a direct result of product liability insurance problems.

A problem also exists for professionals—doctors, lawyers, engineers, and architects—who are forced to conduct their practices without any commercial insurance coverage, or to settle for a policy with a prohibitively high deductible provision. Many private practitioners find it very difficult to cover the deductible portion of a future claim. A study by the Rand Corp. revealed that between 19 and 25 percent of the physicians practicing in Southern California in 1976 had no commercial insurance coverage. The best estimate available was that between 10 and 15 percent of all doctors in the country were practicing without any insurance.

Manufacturers who have not been able to obtain product liability insurance coverage are turning to establishing self-insurance reserve funds. Companies with policies that have high deductibles have also established reserve funds to cover the cost of the deductible portion of the policy. These deductibles sometimes run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The Federal tax laws affect these self-insurance funds in two ways. First, a business expense deduction is not available to the company that pays into its own reserve fund. A comparable payment as an insurance premium would entitle the company to a deduction in that amount. Second, as the self-insurance reserve fund builds up, the interest it earns is taxed, and the fund becomes vulnerable as an "unreasonable" accumulation of capital.

The large firms establish captive insurance companies. Others deal with expensive outside insurance companies. These options, however, are closed to many small companies and individuals.

My bill addresses these problems in two ways. First, it exempts from Federal income tax interest earned on those funds placed in a self-insurance trust fund. Second, the money paid into the fund can be deducted as a cost of doing business, as an insurance premium can be.

These trust funds may be established by groups as well as single persons. Thus, law firms or trade associations would be able to create self-insurance pools for their members, with fewer tax complications than are now encountered. The bill also establishes guidelines for limits on how much money can be placed in the trust. Furthermore, it restricts the use of money placed in the eligible reserve funds, making the money taxable as income if it is withdrawn or used for any other purpose.

The bill puts people who self-insure on the same footing as those who purchase from name carriers. It gives no special benefits to self-insurers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2864

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Product and Professional Liability Insurance Tax Equity Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. TAX EXEMPT PRODUCT LIABILITY TRUSTS.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Subsection (c) of section 501 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to organizations exempt from tax) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(22)(A) A trust providing for the payment of product and professional liability claims against one or more persons (or against any employee of such a person) who are engaged in any trade or business, if, under the terms of the trust, it is impossible for any past of the corpus or income of the trust to be (within the taxable year or thereafter) used for, or diverted to, any purpose other than the payment of such claims, any administrative expenses of such trust, and any expenses directly related to the investigation and settlement (or opposition) of such claims.

"(B) Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, a trust (otherwise meeting the requirements of subparagraph (A)) shall be considered to meet such requirements notwithstanding the fact that the terms of the trust permit corpus and income to be withdrawn from the trust by any person who made any contribution to the trust and used for any purpose other than the payment of such claims and expenses. The preceding sentence shall apply to a trust only if the aggregate amount which may be so withdrawn and used by any person may not exceed the aggregate amount of contributions by such person to the trust. Any amount so withdrawn and used by any person shall be included in the gross income of such person for the taxable year in which withdrawn.

"(C) For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'product and professional liability' means—

"(i) in the case of any person engaged in any trade or business or manufacturing, distributing, or selling any manufactured good, any liability arising from any defect in or use of such good; and

"(ii) in the case of any person engaged in any trade or business of providing any service, any liability arising from the providing of or the failure to provide) such service."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to taxable years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

SEC. 3. DEDUCTION FOR CONTRIBUTION TO TAX-EXEMPT PRODUCT AND PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY TRUST.

(a) General Rule.—Part VI of Subchapter B of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to itemized deductions for individuals and corporations) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 192. CONTRIBUTIONS TO CERTAIN PRODUCT AND PROFESSIONAL LIABILITY TRUST."

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—In the case of a taxpayer who is engaged in any trade or business, there shall be allowed as a deduction an amount (determined under subsection (b)) contributed during the taxable year to a trust described in section 501(c)(21) which provides for the payment of product and and professional liability claims against the taxpayer and arising in connection with the trade or business of the taxpayer.

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, among the many strengths of our great Nation are the numerous and diversified small companies and individuals who provide us with a variety of goods and services. These organizations and individuals are finding it increasingly difficult to compete because of discriminatory regulations or inequities. One such inequity is the present Federal tax structure which discriminates against individuals or companies that self-insure for professional and product liability.

The soaring number of product liability suits in recent years has driven the cost of product liability insurance up so high that many small businessmen can no longer afford coverage or in some cases cannot find an insurance carrier willing to sell it to them. When available, businesses find that insurance premiums have increased at a rate four to six times greater than sales.

A similar problem exists for many professionals, particularly lawyers, engineers, architects, and doctors. They are forced to conduct their practices without any commercial insurance coverage, or settle for a policy with extremely high deductible provisions. This situation has resulted in many professionals practicing without any insurance. Those who are able to obtain coverage with the unusually high deductible provisions find it very difficult to maintain the financial resources necessary to cover the deductible portion of a future claim.

This unfortunate situation has a number of adverse impacts on the consumer. Many companies have been forced to increase the price they charge for the affected products as a direct result of increased product liability premiums. In some instances, firms have been forced to abandon some product lines because of product liability insurance problems.

Many companies and individual professionals who are not able to obtain liability insurance coverage are establishing self-insurance reserve funds. Likewise, companies with policies that have high deductibles have also established reserve funds to cover the cost of the deductible portion of the policy. Unfortunately, the present Federal tax code puts those who self-insure in a double bind. First, a business expense deduction is not available to the company or professional that pays into its own self-insurance reserve. Second, the interest earned by this reserve is taxed and the fund becomes vulnerable as an "unreasonable" accumulation of capital.

The legislation I am today introducing, with my colleague Senator MATHIAS, the Product and Professional Liability Insurance Tax Equity Act, addresses these problems. The bill exempts those funds paid into a self-insurance trust fund from Federal income tax. These trust funds may be established by groups as well as single persons. Thus, law firms or trade associations would be able to create self-insurance pools, with fewer tax difficulties. In addition, the bill provides that money paid into the fund can be deducted as a cost of doing business, just as an insurance premium can be. Guidelines set limits on how much money can be placed in the trust and there are restrictions placed on the use of these funds, making the money taxable as income if it is withdrawn or used for any other purpose.

This bill gives no special benefits to the business or professional that self insures. It simply eliminates an inequity and puts them on the same basis as those who purchase insurance.●

By Mr. NELSON:

S. 2865. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a more equitable estate tax treatment of joint interests in farm and closely held business property; to the Committee on Finance.

ELIMINATE THE "WIDOW'S TAX"

● Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill to do away with the "widow's tax." This is an excess estate tax which is not found in the Internal Revenue Code, but is levied all too often on surviving spouses in farm and small business families under present interpretations of the tax law.

WHAT THE BILL WOULD DO

The bill would allow a surviving wife (or husband) to treat as earned for estate tax purposes up to a 50-percent share of any joint farm or small business property, at the rate of 2 percent a year if that spouse actually participates in the operation of the farm or small business. The bill would not, of course, permit encroachment upon the portion of the property which the other spouse owned before marriage.

DESCRIPTION OF THE PROBLEM

During consideration of the Tax Reform Act of 1976, farm wives and their organizations made the Congress aware of the so-called "widow's tax."

The "widow's tax" is the amount of estate tax which results from the inclusion of the entire value of jointly-held property in the estate of the first spouse to die, even though the spouse may have worked a farm side by side for an entire adult lifetime. The legal cause of this situation is the rule that the survivor (in most cases the wife) is required to show that she "furnished consideration" that is, defined as "money or money's worth") before the IRS would consider her an owner of any part of the property for estate tax purposes. Working a farm or small business full time with the husband is not counted as "consideration furnished."

The imposition of the widow's tax is particularly a problem of unincorporated businesses in light of a tax court decision which decided that if a business is in partnership form, a surviving spouse would be entitled to ownership of joint property in proportion to the allocation of the partnership tax return. Estate of Otte, 31 T.C.M. 301 (1972). If the joint farm or small business property was in a corporation, the percentage of stock held by the widow would be evidence of ownership.

Thus, it is only the smallest and least organized element of the business population that suffers from the problem. But 12 million of the total of 14 million U.S. enterprises, that is, 85 percent of the total, are unincorporated.

EFFORTS AT RELIEF IN THE TAX REFORM ACT OF 1976

In 1976, the Senate Small Business Committee and the Senate Finance Committee combined to initiate a thorough reform in the estate tax laws for the first time since 1942. This helped widows' problems in three ways: First, Congress raised the marital deduction for widows to $250,000. Second, general estate tax allowance was tripled from $60,000 to $175,000 (by 1981). Third, converting this allowance from an exemption into the form of a credit, makes it more beneficial to small and moderate-sized estates than the previous law.

The Tax Reform Act of 1976 addresses the surviving spouse's problem specifically in section 2002. That provision permits a husband to elect to treat one-half of the purchase price of a farm as a gift to his wife. The filing of a gift tax return at the time of marriage, whether or not any tax is due, would eliminate the widow's tax. The election would presumably be exercised by an addendum to the couple's income tax form for that year which would reference or attach the gift tax return.

This left several gaps in the operation of the legislation. One of these was addressed in section 3(K) of the pending Technical Corrections Act, H.R. 6715. This technical amendment would clarify the right of making a gift as to property owned by the husband and wife jointly before the passage of the act.

SHORTCOMINGS OF PRESENT LAW

The 1976 and H.R. 6715 provisions should be adequate for those farmers, small business owners, and others, who are affluent and sophisticated enough, and have time enough, to obtain competent tax-planning advice and assistance. But, as a practical matter, this is likely to extend to a minority of farm and small business families.

For example, the Wisconsin Farmers Union study of their county officers in 1976 revealed that less than 50 percent have wills. Many farm and other working families may not seek such advice until retirement age. Also, there is an inequity in requiring a farmer to pay a gift tax on the 1978 value of property when he acquired or inherited the land 30 or 40 years earlier at far lower prices, and his wife had been helping operate the farm during that period.

Thus, in a letter to the Senate Finance Committee during consideration of the Technical Corrections Act in November 1977, I pointed out that section 2002 was inadequate to resolve the "widow's tax" problem for the following reasons:

Many farm and small business families do not have the resources to seek expert counsel;

If advice is sought, it is usually not at the time of marriage, but much later when the family is close to retirement;

By that time inflation will have pushed the value of the farm and small business property far beyond what it was at the time of marriage, by substantially increasing the possibility that a gift or estate tax will be imposed.

It is only fair that a widow who has contributed a lifetime of effort to the paying off of a mortgage on a farm or small business, and is able to show the IRS that she has done this, should be treated as owner of up to 50 percent of the property and the husband's estate should not be taxed on its entire value. For these reasons, we are now seeking a way to achieve that result through an amendment to the Federal estate tax statute.

The bill would work this way. In the event of death of a husband or wife who is a joint owner of property, and who has been working a farm jointly with his or her spouse, this proposal would deem the survivor, for estate tax purposes, to have "furnished consideration" for their joint property at the rate of 2 percent a year, up to a maximum of 50 percent of the portion of the property which has not been paid for at the time of marriage.

This would permit the wife who did not furnish any of the downpayment (and the farm may have been inherited before marriage) to "earn out" 50 percent of the remaining share within 25 years.

Of course, the spouse could not earn by operation of this law a share of what the other spouse owned outright at the time of marriage. Thus, if a husband had made a downpayment of 50 percent on some farm acreage before marriage from his own funds, the wife would be entitled to "earn out" only half of the remaining 50 percent.

By the same token, if a wife inherited a farm free and clear, there would be no remaining balance for the husband "to earn out" under this measure.

The bill would only apply to that share which was unpaid for at the time of marriage, and that was earned by their joint labor which could be demonstrated to the tax authorities.

SUPPORTING ARGUMENTS

In addition to the distinction drawn by the law between proprietorship businesses and other kinds, which I feel is unjustified, there are other considerations which I would advance in behalf of this bill.

It would assist the least sophisticated taxpayers which include the majority of farm and small business taxpayers facing the potential hardship of a "widow's tax," who deserve relief equally as much as those who can afford expensive counsel. The proposed amendment would therefore treat rich and poor the same before the law.

It would appear that the joint legal ownership, length of the relationship, and the labor of both parties, are clear signals of the intent of the parties that such property should be jointly owned for all purposes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and Mr. MATHIAS):

S. 2867. A bill to remove residency requirements and acreage limitations applicable to land subject to reclamation law; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

REPEAL OF ACREAGE LIMITS AND RESIDENCY REQUIREMENTS OF RECLAMATION LAW

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am introducing today, with the senior Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), a bill to repeal the acreage limits and residency requirements of reclamation law.

The bill is a companion to H.R. 11944, which has been introduced by Congressman STUMP in the House.

Mr. President, I feel so strongly about the need for correcting the antiquated 1902 Reclamation Act that I believe the best solution is to repeal the offensive provisions entirely.

In my opinion, no magic figure, such as 600 or 1,000 acres, will work.

It is impossible to apply a flat rule to every type of crop. Even if we could devise an average acreage needed for efficiency of production as to specific crops in specific areas of the country, today's figure might not be adequate for the future. Today's 1,000-acre efficient farm might be a 2,000-acre farm in the future due to changing technology and inflationary costs of production.

The current 160-acre restriction on individual ownership of irrigable land that can be supplied with reclamation project water is absurd. Even if family ownerships are taken into account, an artificial rule of this kind is inadequate to modern agriculture. And, why, I would ask, should a farmer who does not have a large family be put at a disadvantage with his neighbors solely on the basis of family size?

Mr. President, as an example, let me discuss cotton, which is the most valuable crop in Arizona.

Arizona's 1977 cotton crop totaled 1,110,000 bales. The value of our cotton and cottonseed was $355 million last year, 40 percent of the value of all crops grown in the State. When we add the usual multiplier effect to this value, we can see that the 1977 cotton and cottonseed income added approximately $1½ billion to Arizona's economy.

About 90 percent of our cotton is exported. These exports help to counter the massive deficit in our Nation's trade account caused by fuel imports.

To these statistics, let me add that the average size cotton farm in Arizona dependent solely upon farm income is about 1,200 acres. This is the most economic family-size unit in our State at this time. However, this figure will increase in the future as farming production costs increase.

Alfalfa and grain crops are also two major crops grown in Arizona. Arizona cash receipts for these crops in 1977 totaled about $160 million. These crops, too, require expensive machinery that must be economically utilized.

For example, an average size tractor with plowing, planting, and cultivating equipment now costs $50,000. A two-row cotton picker costs about $58,000. A grain combine about $60,000. Haying equipment costs about $35,000.

So the large size of farms in producing these crops did not just happen. They grew out of necessity and they will have to grow larger to stay efficient as production costs rise.

Today, almost every aspect of farming is mechanized, along with the development of new, higher yield crops. All of this costs a great deal of money and is generally more than the small farmer can afford.

So we have a choice. We either increase the cost of farm products way beyond the pocketbook of the average household, and at the same time we price ourselves out of the export markets, or we put some commonsense into an archaic and restrictive farm law.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2867

By Mr. PERCY:

S. 2868. A bill to provide a remedy against the United States for torts arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States committed by officers or employees of the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

FEDERAL TORT CLAIMS ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill amending the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA) to broaden the liability of the United States for tortious acts committed by its employees including violations of the U.S. Constitution, such as illegal search and seizures. This legislation will also make the remedy against the Federal Government almost entirely exclusive of any action against the individual who committed the tort. It further provides that the agency whose employee committed the tort shall pay damages from appropriations available to that agency.

The FTCA derives from the concept of sovereign immunity, a privileged status which English common law has always accorded to its rulers. The principle that the sovereign should enjoy immunity against civil suit developed from two beliefs: first, the idea that the "king can do no wrong"; and second, the apparent contradiction of allowing the power which makes the laws to be sued under those laws. It was, therefore, established that the King could not be sued unless he gave his consent; otherwise, he was immune from suit.

In 1821 this anomalous concept found its way into American jurisprudence. By the mid-10th century, it became apparent that absolute governmental immunity was impractical, and several laws were passed permitting a cause of action against the Government on issues concerning contracts, patents, and maritime rights. In 1946, a major departure from tradition came with the passage of the FTCA. This law allows a victim of governmental negligence, trespass, or invasion of privacy to sue the United States for actual, verifiable damages resulting from certain tortious acts of Federal employees. (28 U.S.C. 1346(b))

Mr. President, the legislation I am proposing today would correct three major problems with the amended 1946 FTCA. The first of these is the scope of Government liability. Generally, the United States is liable as if it were an individual, according to the law of the place where the tortious act of the Federal employee occurred. However, the final section of the FTCA, 28 U.S.C. 2680, maintains immunity for many broad areas of Government activity.

The two largest areas covered are intentional torts and discretionary functions. I believe that Government immunity for intentional torts can in no way be justified. Section 2680 of the original FTCA maintained immunity for assault, battery, false arrest, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, abuse of process, libel, slander, misrepresentation, deceit, and interference with contract rights—a victim of these intentional torts and committed by Government agents and could not recover damages from the United States.

These exemptions were in effect on the evening of April 23, 1973, when 12 Federal and State narcotics agents mistakenly raided the homes of two innocent families in Collinsville, Ill. The provisions of section 2680 prevented these families from collecting compensation from the Federal Government for the humiliation and abuse they suffered. The agents themselves were sued individually (under the reasoning of Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents of the Federal Bureau of Narcotics, 403 U.S. 388 (1971)), but were successful in asserting that they were acting in good faith, thereby absolving themselves of liability for the torts they intentionally committed. In the end, these two families were unable to collect any compensation for the wrongs they had suffered.

In response to the gross injustices of Collinsville, then-Senator Sam Ervin and I introduced an amendment to the FTCA to make the Federal Government liable for certain intentional torts of Federal investigative and law enforcement officers. This legislation was signed into law on March 16, 1974. However, its coverage is limited to designated intentional torts committed by a narrowly defined group of law enforcement agents. The bill I introduce today would expand Government liability to all intentional torts committed by all Federal officers or employees, thus better insuring that victims of these types of incidents will be adequately compensated.

Immunity for discretionary functions is a more complex issue. The Supreme Court reasoned in Dalehite v. United States, 346 U.S. 15 (1953), that some type of governmental immunity for discretionary functions is necessary in order that Government not be sued for undertaking those policymaking activities which are part and parcel of governing. Allowing the Government to be sued for undertaking these decisionmaking activities in good faith could lead to overly cautious and ineffective Government. This discretionary exemption to Government liability is often justified, for the gain to society in Government effectiveness often outweighs the costs of unremedied injuries.

In Bivens, the Supreme Court expressed the simple proposition that when a citizen's constitutional rights are violated by a Government official, he has the right to sue that official for damages. It would seem incongruous for an aggrieved citizen whose rights have been violated to be able to sue the individual employee but not the Government in whose name the wrongs were committed.

The discretionary exception should not allow the Government to avoid responsibility for respecting the constitutional rights of the American people. The Bill of Rights was intended to be inviolable. I propose therefore, to continue the discretionary exemption for common law torts. However, violations of constitutional rights, even those committed in the course of discretionary functions, would not be immune from Government liability.

This bill therefore expands Government liability for so-called constitutional and statutory torts and makes it clear beyond question that citizens will be able to recover damages for constitutional violations, such as illegal search-and-seizures by Government agents. Presently, the Government is expressly liable only for those actions which would be torts under the State or local law. Uncertainties arise, however, when the local common law of torts does not explicitly cover infringements of rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution or Federal statutes that regardless of local laws, violations of federally insured rights by employees of the United States will be a tort under Federal law and will require the payment of appropriate damages.

The second major flaw in the 1946 FTCA is the nature of its remedy. Currently, a plaintiff may sue the Government and the responsible Federal employee jointly, or each individually. In practice, the Government, under the theory of respondeat superior, almost always pays the damages even where the individual employee shares in the liability. Nevertheless, concern has developed that some Federal employees may be hesitant to carry out their duties as vigorously as possible for fear of being named a defendant in a lawsuit. The time-consuming court procedures and the possibility, no matter how remote, of a financially ruinous judgment, could lead to mediocre Government, rather than innovation and vigor.

The bill I offer today would provide an election of remedies. In cases where the employee was acting in good faith and within the scope of his office, remedy against the United States would be exclusive. In cases where the employee is alleged to have acted in bad faith or in a reckless manner, the victim could elect to sue either the Government, or the employee, but not both. The Government would be prohibited from asserting as a defense the good faith belief of the employee in the lawfulness of his conduct. This would act as a strong incentive for the victim to sue the Government. However, in cases where the employee allegedly acted in bad faith, the victim could elect to sue him personally. Although the plaintiff would have less assurance of actual recovery than if he sought compensation from the "deep pockets" of the U.S. Treasury, he may decide that more is at stake than the simple recovery of damages. An employee who uses his position as a shield behind which he willfully commits tortious acts or woefully neglects his responsibility should, if the victim so desires, be made accountable for his actions in court.

This legislation would make a third major improvement over the present FTCA: It would create more direct accountability, giving agencies the needed incentive to properly train and discipline their employees. Under current law, administratively settled claims over $2,500 and all damage judgments are paid from general revenues. Most payments are made in this manner, greatly weakening the impact which the payment of these damages could have on the future conduct of the individual tortfeasor or the policies of the agency employing him. Under the amendment, successful claims would be paid from the appropriations available to the agency whose employee committed the tort. Agency heads would have an incentive to prevent tortious behaviour of Federal employees. Congress could and should look into operations of any agency which failed to do so.

The measure also stipulates a minimum award of $1,000 for constitutional torts, providing a special deterrent to intrusions upon fourth and fifth amendment rights. This provision is also designed to insure that violations of individual rights are not ignored or passed over in cases where no tangible monetary damages occur. The plaintiff would be entitled to all actual damages, and to provide for more serious intangible harms, such as pain and suffering, the amendment permits payment of general damages of up to $100,000. Punitive damages up to $50,000 are authorized to be awarded at the discretion of the court. Finally, so as not to require an innocent victim of a tort to bear the burden of attorney fees and other litigation costs, the court could award reasonable compensation to a successful plaintiff for legal expenses.

Mr. President, I believe the time has come to thoroughly reform the FTCA. There have been several bills introduced during the last two sessions of Congress which attempted to do away with one or another anachronistic aspects of sovereign immunity. Among the supporters of such bills have been former Senator Hruska (S. 2558, 93d Congress), Senator KENNEDY (S. 800, 94th Congress), and Representative RODINO and former Representative Hutchinson (H.R. 10439, 93d Congress).

In September, 1977, Senator EASTLAND introduced on behalf of the administration S. 2117, which is in agreement with many of the provisions of the legislation I am submitting today. There are three basic differences, however. First, the administration proposal would extend immunity to individual agents in every case, including those involving intentional misconduct and reckless acts. This, I believe, is a major flaw with that measure. Why should an employee who has seriously abused the authority vested in him be immune from a lawsuit? If there has been bad faith or extreme negligence involved, the employee should be accountable for the wrong he has done. As a matter of simple justice, my proposal would deny immunity to employees who act in reckless disregard of their responsibilities or in bad faith. While it is important to encourage employees to carry out their duties as energetically as feasible, there must remain a mechanism to make accountable those who would overstep this broad authority. We must not, in the interest of reform, invite the reoccurrence of the official lawlessness which has come to light over the last few years.

The second difference is that the administration bill would provide that practically all settlements and awards paid under the FTCA be drawn from general revenues rather than from the appropriations of the affected agency. I support the latter approach for it would make each agency more directly accountable for the actions of its employees.

Finally, there is no provision under S. 2117 for third party suits by the Government against employees who have acted recklessly or in bad faith. I must again state my strong belief that in these extreme cases, the employee must bear the consequences for his actions. My proposed legislation would give the Federal Government, in cases where the victim of such torts elected to sue the United States and not the employee, the right of indemnity against the employee for all or part of the liability.

The measure I offer today builds on recent reforms in the FTCA and incorporates many of the reforms proposed in the above-mentioned bills. I believe this legislation is a workable compromise between those who desire absolute immunity for Federal employees and those who desire the system as it now exists.

Mr. President, I hope that prompt action will be taken on this bill so that the important changes it would make in the Federal sovereign immunity law can be enacted without undue delay. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

After such substitution the United States shall have available all defenses to which it would have been entitled if the action had originally been commenced against the United States under this chapter and section 1346(b).

"(2) Except as provided in paragraph (4), upon certification by the Attorney General that the defendant employee was acting within the scope of his office or employment, or in claims arising under the Constitution or the laws of the United States that the employee was acting within the scope of his office or employment, or under the color thereof, at the time of the act or omission out of which the action arose, any such civil action or proceeding commenced in a State court shall be removed, without bond, at any time before trial, by the Attorney General to the district court of the United States of the district and division embracing the place wherein it is pending and be deemed an action brought against the United States under the provisions of this title and all references thereto, and the United States shall be substituted as the party defendant. After such substitution the United States shall have available all defenses to which it would have been entitled if the action had originally been commenced against the United States under this chapter and section 1346(b). The certification of the Attorney General shall conclusively establish scope of office or employment and in claims arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, scope of office or employment or acting under color thereof, for purposes of such initial removal. Should a district court of the United States determine on a hearing on a motion to remand held before trial on the merits that the employee defendant was not acting within the scope of his office or employment, and in claims arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, acting within the scope of his office or employment or under color thereof, the case shall be remanded to the State court in which it was initially filed.

"(3) Where an action or proceeding under this chapter is precluded because of the availability of a remedy through proceedings for compensation or other benefits from the United States as provided by any other law, the action or proceeding shall be dismissed, but in that event the running of any limitation of time for commencing, or filing an application or claim in, such proceeding for compensation or other benefits shall be deemed to have been suspended during the pendency of the civil action or proceeding under this chapter.

"(4) Paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection shall not apply to any action brought against an employee (or the estate of such employee) in his individual capacity for a tort arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States or for any international tort, in which it is alleged that the employee acted recklessly or did not in good faith believe the lawfulness of his conduct.";

(4) by adding at the end of such section the following:

"(f) Whenever an action is brought against the United States under sections 1346(b)(2) and 2672 rather than against the employee (or the estate of such employee) in his individual capacity, the United States shall have a right of indemnity against the employee whose act or omission gave rise to the claim or against the estate of such employee, for all or part of the amount of its liability. The United States may enforce such right of indemnity in a separate civil action or proceeding in any district court or by filing a third party complaint against such employee or his estate in the action brought by the claimant under this section, without regard to the amount in controversy.".

SEC. 7. Section 2680 of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by amending the matter preceding paragraph (a) to read as follows: "Except for tort claims arising under the Constitution of the United States or laws of the United States, the provisions of this chapter and section 1346(b) of this title shall not apply to—"; and

(2) by repealing paragraph (h).

SEC. 8. (a) Subsections (a) through (d) of section 4116 of title 38, United States Code, are repealed, and subsection (e) of that section is amended by deletion of the designation "(e)", by deleting the words "person to whom the immunity provisions of this section apply (as described in subsection (a) of this section)," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "employee of the Department of Medicine and Surgery".

S. 2869. A bill to authorize the establishment of an international emergency wheat reserve, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT RESERVE ACT OF 1978

● Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I am today introducing at the request of the administration a bill to authorize the President to establish and maintain a wheat reserve to provide for specified emergency and developmental food needs abroad and to fulfill any reserve stock obligations of the United States under a wheat trade convention of an international wheat agreement.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and the accompanying letter from Secretary Bergland be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2869

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "International Wheat Reserve Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. The Congress hereby declares it to be the policy of the United States to develop a wheat reserve to provide for emergency humanitarian and developmental food needs abroad and to fulfill any reserve stock obligations of the United States under the Wheat Trade Convention.

SEC. 3. In order to carry out the policy and accomplish the objectives set forth in section 2 of this Act, the President shall establish a reserve stock of wheat of up to 6 million metric tons: Provided, That in the event the United States undertakes any reserve stock obligations under the Wheat Trade Convention, the maximum may be increased to such level as the President deems necessary to carry out section 5(a) of this Act.

SEC. 4. Stocks of wheat for such reserve may be acquired (1) through purchases from producers or in the market: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture (hereinafter referred to as "the Secretary") determines that such purchases will not unduly disrupt the market, and (2) by designation by the Secretary of stocks of wheat acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

SEC. 5. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, stocks of wheat so designated or acquired for the wheat reserve provided for by this Act may be released by the President for sale or donation for the following purposes:

(i) To provide humanitarian relief in any foreign country which suffers a major disaster as determined by the President;

(ii) to assist any developing country to meet its food requirements in any year in which the market price of wheat is high and the United States domestic supply of wheat is limited so as to warrant release from the reserve for this purpose; or

(iii) to fulfill any reserve stock obligations of the United States under the Wheat Trade Convention.

(b) In making the determination to release wheat for the purposes of clauses (i) and (ii) of subsection (a) of this section, the President shall take into consideration food assistance authorized under the Agricultural Trade Development Assistance Act of 1954.

(c) The President may designate a portion of the reserve to be utilized only for the purpose of clause (iii) of subsection (a) of this section.

SEC. 6. (a) Upon determination by the President under Section 5(a) that wheat shall be released from the reserve, the Secretary is authorized to make all necessary arrangements for the release and disposition thereof on such terms and conditions as the Secretary determines will effectuate the purposes of this Act.

(b) Wheat released from the reserve for the purposes of clauses (i) and (ii) of section 5(a) may, as determined by the President, be made available pursuant to agreements which the President enters into with representatives of foreign governments or under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954: Provided, That the last sentence of section 401(a) of such Act with respect to determination of availability shall not be applicable thereto.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to pay, with respect to stocks of wheat released from the reserve for donation for the purposes of clauses (i) and (ii) of section 5(a), costs of processing, transportation, handling, and other incidental costs to designated points abroad.

SEC. 7. The Secretary shall provide for the storage of stocks of wheat in the reserve and for the periodic rotation of stocks of wheat in the reserve to avoid spoilage and deterioration of such stocks, utilizing programs authorized by the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 and any other provision of law, but any quantity removed from the wheat reserve for rotation purposes shall be promptly replaced with an equivalent quantity.

SEC. 8. Stocks of wheat in the reserve shall not be considered a part of the total domestic supply including carryover, for the purposes of section 5(a)(ii) or for the purpose of administering the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and shall not be subject to any quantitative limitations on export which may be imposed pursuant to section 3(2)(A) of the Export Administration Act of 1969 (50 U.S.C. App. 2413).

SEC. 9. (a) The funds and authorities of the Commodity Credit Corporation shall be utilized by the Secretary in carrying out this Act: Provided, That any restrictions applicable to the acquisition, storage or disposition of Commodity Credit Corporation owned or controlled commodities shall not apply with respect to the acquisition, storage or disposal of wheat for or in the reserve.

(b) The Commodity Credit Corporation shall be reimbursed from funds made available for carrying out the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 for wheat released from the reserve which is made available under such Act, such reimbursement to be made on the basis of actual costs incurred by Commodity Credit Corporation with respect to such wheat or the export market price of wheat, as determined by the Secretary, as of the time the wheat is released from the reserve for such purpose, whichever is lower. Such reimbursement shall be made from funds appropriated for that purpose in subsequent years.

SEC. 10. Any determination by the President or the Secretary under this Act shall be final.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D.C., March 15, 1978.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed for the consideration of Congress is a draft bill "To authorize the establishment of an international emergency wheat reserve, and for other related purposes." This proposal will authorize the President to establish and maintain a wheat reserve to provide for specified emergency and developmental food needs abroad and to fulfill any reserve stock obligations of the United States under a Wheat Trade Convention of an International Wheat Agreement.

This department recommends that the draft bill be enacted.

This bill would authorize stocks of wheat for the International Emergency Wheat Reserve (IEWR) to be acquired by designating wheat in the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC) inventory to be part of the reserve and by purchasing wheat in the market or directly from farmers when the Secretary determines such purchases will not unduly disrupt the market. Wheat from the IEWR could be released for sale or donation only to (1) provide humanitarian relief in any foreign country which suffers a major disaster, as determined by the President; (2) assist any developing country to meet its food requirements in any year in which the market price of wheat is high and the United States domestic supply is limited so as to warrant release from the reserve for this purpose; or (3) to fulfill any reserve stock obligations of the United States under a Wheat Trade Convention.

If enacted, it is intended that this authority will be used, in combination with farmer-owned reserve authorities, to place into reserve up to 15 million metric tons (550 million bushels) of wheat before the beginning of the 1978 crop year. The IEWR share of this reserve will not exceed 6 million tons (220 million bushels), unless the United States undertakes reserve stock obligations under the Wheat Trade Convention currently being negotiated which, in combination with the food aid reserve objectives of this bill, would require a higher level of government-owned reserve stocks. If it is necessary to increase the IEWR to meet the intent of this legislation, acquisitions of 1976- and 1977-crop wheat under the price support program which have been designated as part of the IEWR will be supplemented to the extent necessary by purchases of wheat in the market or directly from farmers. Such purchases would be made, if necessary, after the farmer-owned reserve target has been met.

The President's budget, submitted to the Congress in January, includes funds for the establishment of 15 million tons of wheat reserves in fiscal year 1978, including a 6 million ton IEWR. Removing excess 1976- and 1977-crop wheat from the market and placing it in reserve, and lowering production through the 20 percent set-aside program for 1978, should result in higher prices for the 1978 crop. This should substantially reduce budget outlays for loan activities and deficiency payments in fiscal 1979, unless weather conditions are unusually good. Costs of the IEWR in years beyond fiscal 1979 cannot be predicted reliably. They will depend on the quantity of wheat required to fulfill the purposes of this bill and on the extra CCC costs, if any, of replacing and storing these reserves.

An identical letter has been sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that enactment of this proposal would be in accord with the Program of the President.

Sincerely,

BOB BERGLAND, Secretary.●

By Mr. PELL:

S. 2870. A bill to amend title 38 of the United States Code in order to require the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to pay a $150 allowance to any State or any agency or political subdivision of a State in reimbursement for expenses incurred in the burial of each veteran in any cemetery owned by such State or agency or political subdivision of a State, if the cemetery or section thereof is used solely for the interment of veterans; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation identical to H.R. 7263, which was introduced in the first session of this Congress by my colleague from Rhode Island, Congressman BEARD, to provide for the Federal subsidization of veterans' cemetery sites throughout our country.

It is proper and fitting recognition for veterans who have served this Nation through both wartime and peacetime to be accorded the honor of burial in a cemetery area reserved and maintained in an appropriate manner exclusively for veterans. For decades this has been possible at specially designated cemeteries throughout our Nation, and this has meant a great deal to those veterans and their families.

With the increase in the number of interments, some of our older cemeteries have been filled and new cemeteries have been selected and opened.

My own State of Rhode Island has had for the last 3½ years a fine State veterans cemetery, located in Exeter. In the short time it has been opened, almost 1,000 burials have taken place, and the near future will see an even more rapid rate of interment according to statistics I have received from Louis P. Alfano, Jr., my State's Chief of Veterans' Affairs.

There are 152,000 veterans in Rhode Island, and 60 percent of them served in World War II. Their average age is 57 years, and this means that within the next 20 years the Rhode Island veterans cemetery will be an increasingly important part of our commitment to our veterans.

However, the cost of maintaining this State veterans cemetery and of purchasing additional land for its projected expansion is a heavy burden upon my State, and this legislation would be of enormous assistance, in this regard.

Accordingly, this legislation would mandate Federal assistance to this important veterans cemetery and to others throughout our country. It is a fitting and proper step to take to honor our veterans who have contributed so much and who certainly deserve an appropriate resting place near their home and their surviving family members.●

By Mr. PEARSON:

S. 2871. A bill to create a rural community development bank to assist in rural community development by making financial, technical, and other assistance available for the establishment of expansion of commercial, industrial, and related private and public facilities and services, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

RURAL COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT OF 1978

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill designed to assist the revitalization and continued economic growth of our rural communities. The bill would stimulate and support balanced economic growth in rural communities by establishing a Rural Community Development Bank, which would make financial, technical, and planning assistance available to small communities in nonmetropolitan areas.

Mr. President, past Federal initiatives for rural economic development have fallen short. Notwithstanding recent growth trends in some rural sections of our country, substantial disparities still exist between rural and metropolitan areas in terms of job opportunities, income levels, adequacy of housing, access to quality health, care, and other public facilities and services. Past Federal policies have been particularly remiss in the area of encouraging business and industry to invest in job-creating enterprises in rural areas. A recent review of rural development policy prepared by the assistant secretaries working group for rural development found that Federal programs for rural areas have concentrated on public facilities improvements and have not stimulated significant private sector employment.

The legislation I propose would encourage creation of new job opportunities in rural areas by attracting private capital through the mechanism of a federally chartered rural community development bank. Such a bank could support local financial institutions and insure that adequate credit resources were available to meet the needs of private enterprises that would expand or locate in small communities.

The development bank concept is not, of course, a new idea. I have sponsored similar rural development bank proposals in previous Congresses, as have others. I am reintroducing my rural development bank proposal today, because I sense a reawakening interest in the economic well-being, and quality of life in general, of rural America. Earlier this year, the White House Conference on Balanced National Growth and Economic Development, which was authorized by the Public Works and Economic Act Amendments of 1976, conducted a series of meetings attended by participants from all 50 States to study and make recommendations for national economic policies to foster sustained and balanced growth. More recently, the President has proposed creation of a National Development Bank as part of his urban policy. Although we will have to wait for the details, the National Bank would make assistance available to rural communities as well as urban areas. While this is a positive step for rural development, it should not represent the end, but the beginning, of discussion concerning ways to sustain economic growth throughout rural America.

Mr. President, the Rural Community Development Bank that I propose would be a self-financing, Government-chartered corporation. The bill provides that the bank would be capitalized through the sale of $1 billion in nonvoting stock to the U.S. Treasury. Initially, the Treasury would purchase 20 percent of this amount. As the bank's business developed, the Treasury would be authorized to purchase additional bank stock in amounts of up to $200,000 a year. The startup moneys paid in by the Federal Government would be financed through the sale of Treasury obligations to the public. Consequently, the $1 billion capitalization of the bank would not represent any direct appropriations from the Treasury. The bank could also require persons who received financial assistance to purchase bank stock.

With this capital surplus, the bank could issue bonds for sale in the private market to raise the funds it would use to provide loans, loan guarantees, and other financial assistance. The terms and conditions for such financial assistance would be set at a level to recover the bank's operating expenses.

Bank policies would be governed by a 17-member Board of Directors. Initially, 13 members would be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the Government and private sectors. The remaining four members would be elected by borrowers and other recipients of bank assistance who held bank stock. When the amount of voting stock exceeded the amount of nonvoting stock, five of the directors appointed by the President would be replaced by directors elected by recipients of bank assistance, giving them a majority voice in bank policy.

Mr. President, the bank would be authorized to make loans and loan guarantees to new or expanded private enterprises in small communities located in nonmetropolitan counties. Although small communities in some nonmetropolitan areas have been experiencing economic growth in recent years, these areas are primarily in counties adjacent to metropolitan areas. Other nonadjacent rural areas have experienced little or no growth. Consequently, the bank's principal focus would be upon communities located in nonmetropolitan areas that were more than 25 miles from an urban center. Nonetheless, a small community adjacent to a metropolitan area could qualify for assistance if the bank found there was a lack of credit resources available for investment in that community.

The bank would also be authorized to provide financial assistance to public and quasipublic entities for the development, expansion, or improvement of industrial sites and other public facilities necessary to support a community's development effort.

Financial assistance could also be provided for housing construction if it was determined that additional housing was necessary for the employees of a new or expanding business.

In addition to loans and loan guarantees, the bill would authorize the bank to buy and sell its own obligations and to buy and sell obligations originated by other lenders for rural development purposes consistent with those outlined in the bill. The bank would be encouraged to involve other lending institutions in rural development loans and to create a secondary market for such loans.

Finally, the bill provides that the bank would make technical and planning assistance available to public bodies to enable them to maximize the benefits from rural investment in their communities.

Mr. President, the Rural Community Development Bank will not guarantee equality of economic opportunity between rural and urban areas. A rural development bank, however, can contribute to balanced national growth by insuring that adequate credit resources are available to rural communities to encourage and sustain their economic growth.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2871

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Rural Community Development Bank Act of 1978".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

(1) providing financial assistance for the establishment and improvement of commercial and industrial facilities that increase job opportunities in such communities, supporting private and public development facilities, and housing related to rural development projects financed under this Act;

(2) encouraging private investment in such facilities;

(3) bringing together investment opportunities, public and private capital, and capable management;

(4) making available technical and other supportive assistance to aid rural economic development; and

(5) seeking to achieve these purposes through the establishment of a borrower-owned rural development bank, which will aid private investors, financial institutions, and public agencies to finance rural development projects.

(4) The term "rural community" means any community, whether or not incorporated, which—

(A) is located in a county that is not part of a standard metropolitan statistical area; and

(B) is not within 25 miles of a standard metropolitan statistical area with a population of more than 250,000; except that, not withstanding subparagraph (B), the bank may determine that a community is a rural community if it finds that (i) there is a lack of public or private financial resources available for investment in the community, and (ii) assistance under this Act is necessary for the continued economic development or redevelopment of such community.

ESTABLISHMENT OF BANK

SEC. 4. There is hereby created a corporation to be known as the "Rural Community Development Bank" (hereinafter referred to as the "bank") which shall be an instrumentality of the United States Government, and shall be subject to the provisions of this Act.

DIRECTORS AND OFFICERS

SEC. 5 (a) The bank shall have a Board of Directors consisting of seventeen individuals who are citizens of the United States of whom one shall be elected annually by the Board to serve as Chairman. Members of the Board shall be selected as follows:

(1) The President of the United States shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, seven members of the Board who shall be officials or employees of government, including Federal, State, and local government. The terms of directors so appointed shall be for four years, except that the terms of such directors first taking office, shall expire as designated by the President at the time of appointment, four at the end of two years, and three at the end of four years after such date. Any director appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term. At the discretion of the President, any individual who ceases to be an official or employee of the Government during his term as director may, notwithstanding that fact, complete his term.

(2) The President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint six members of the Board from among representatives of the private sector. Of the six persons so appointed, three shall be from among representatives of business and finance, one from among representatives of organized labor, one from among representatives of community development organizations and one from among representatives of the general public. The terms of directors so appointed shall be for four years, except that the terms of such directors first taking office shall expire as designated by the President at the time of appointment, three of the members at the end of two years, and three at the end of four years after such date. Any director so appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, shall be appointed for the remainder of such term and shall be chosen from among representatives of the same category as his predecessor.

(3) Four members of the Board will be elected by holders of class B stock. The terms of elected directors will be for four years, except that the terms of such directors first taking office shall expire as designated by the President at the time of appointment of directors under paragraphs (1) and (2), two of the members at the end of two years, and two at the end of four years after such date.

(4) At the first annual meeting of the Corporation after the amount of class B stock issued and outstanding exceeds the value of class A stock issued and outstanding, three of the members of the Board appointed by the President under subsection (a) (1) and two of the members of the Board appointed by the President under subsection (a) (2) shall, in accordance with the regulations of the Board, be subject to replacement by directors elected by the class B stockholders.

(b) The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a president of the bank. The president of the bank shall be the chief administrative officer of the bank and shall perform all functions and duties of the bank, in accordance with the general policies established by, and subject to the general supervision of, the Board, and shall engage such other officers and employees as the bank deems necessary to carry out its functions. The appointment of the president and not more than two vice presidents may be made without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and they may be paid without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates. The president of the bank shall be an ex officio member of the Board of Directors and may participate in meetings of the Board, except that he shall have no vote except in case of an equal division. No individual other than a citizen of the United States may be an officer of the bank. No officer or employee of the bank other than members of the Board shall receive any salary, other than a pension, from any source other than the bank during the period of his employment by the bank.

(c) Members of the Board may receive the sum of $150 for each day or part thereof spent in the performance of their official duties, which compensation, however, shall not be paid (1) for more than seventy-five days (or parts of days) in any calendar year, (2) to any Board member who is a full-time officer or employee of the United States, or (3) if such payment is otherwise prohibited by law. In addition, such members shall be reimbursed for necessary travel, subsistence, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their official duties without regard to the laws with respect to allowances which may be made on account of travel and subsistence expenses of officers and employed personnel of the United States.

CAPITALIZATION OF BANK

SEC. 6. (a) Subject to the provisions of this section, the bank is authorized to issue from time to time and to have outstanding class A capital stock of an aggregate purchase price not to exceed $1,000,000,000. Shares of such stock shall be nonvoting and without par value.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to and shall subscribe for and acquire on behalf of the United States, upon request of the Board of Directors, the class A capital stock of the bank of a total purchase price of $1,000,000,000. The subscription of the United States shall be paid as follows:

(1) Not more than 20 per centum shall be paid at the time the bank is organized, as provided for in an appropriation Act, and shall be available as needed by the bank for its operations.

(2) The remaining 80 per centum shall be paid on call by the bank only when required to carry out the provisions of this Act, except that not more than 20 per centum of the total amount may be called in any fiscal year, as provided for in an appropriation Act.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay the subscription of the United States to stock of the bank from time to time when payments are required to be made to the bank. For the purpose of making these payments, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction $1,000,000,000 of the proceeds of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under that Act are extended to include such purpose. Payment under this paragraph of the subscription of the United States to the bank and repayments thereof shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States.

(c) In addition, the Board of Directors is authorized from time to time to issue to the public and have outstanding class B stock of an aggregate purchase price not to exceed $1,000,000,000, or such larger amount as may be approved in an appropriation Act. Shares of such stock shall be nonvoting until such time as the amount of such stock issued and outstanding exceeds the aggregate amount of class A stock issued and outstanding.

(d) In providing for the issuance of class B stock, the Board is authorized to require a person receiving financial assistance from the bank to purchase a minimum number or amount of class B shares, but in no case shall such minimum amount exceed five per centum of the amount of the loan, loan guarantee, or other assistance provided by the bank.

(e) Stock and other securities issued by the bank pursuant to this section and section 7 shall be exempt securities under section 3 of the Securities Act of 1933 (15 U.S.C. 77C).

OPERATIONS AND POWERS OF THE BANK

SEC. 7. (a) In order to carry out the purposes of this Act, the bank is authorized to—

(1) make, participate in, or guarantee loans for real or personal property or for working capital to any individual, association, partnership, corporation, or public agency, including a cooperative, for the establishment, expansion, or preservation of any commercial or industrial facility, housing necessarily related thereto, or a supporting private or public development facility which is to be established or is located in or near a rural community;

(2) make, participate in, or guarantee loans, including interim financing, for the construction or improvement of such facilities to building contractors, subcontractors, or other persons engaged in such work;

(3) provide technical assistance to State and local governments in the preparation and implementation of comprehensive rural community development projects and programs, including the evaluation of priorities and the formulation of specific project proposals, and charge appropriate fees for such assistance;

(4) undertake research and information gathering, and to facilitate the exchange of advanced concepts and techniques relating to rural community growth and development among State and local governments;

(5) develop criteria to assure that projects assisted by it are not inconsistent with comprehensive planning for the development of the community in which the projects to be assisted will be located or disruptive of Federal programs which authorize Federal assistance for the development of like or similar categories of projects;

(6) seek to bring together investment opportunities in such facilities, capital, and capable management; and

(7) carry on such other activities as would further the purposes of this Act.

(b) To obtain indirect participation by private and public financial sources, the bank is authorized to—

(1) issue such obligations as it may determine on a competitive, negotiated or other basis at the discretion of the Board of Directors;

(2) invest funds not needed in its financing operations in such property and obligations as it may determine;

(3) purchase and sell securities or obligations it has issued or guaranteed or in which it has invested;

(4) guarantee securities in which it has invested for the purpose of facilitating their sale; and

(5) purchase and sell loans originated by private financial institutions to borrowers for rural development purposes consistent with the purposes of this Act.

(c) Whenever necessary to meet contractual payments of interest, amortization of principal, or other charges on the bank's own borrowing, or to meet the bank's liabilities with respect to similar payments on loans guaranteed by it, the bank may call an appropriate amount of the unpaid subscription of the United States in accordance with section 6(b)(2).

(d) If the bank finds that a default on financing provided by it may be of long duration, the bank may call an additional amount of such unpaid subscriptions for the following purposes—

(1) to redeem prior to maturity, or otherwise discharge its liability on, all or part of the outstanding principal of any loan guaranteed by it with respect to which the debtor is in default; or

(2) to repurchase, or otherwise discharge its liability on, all or part of its own outstanding borrowings.

(e) The bank is authorized to establish a principal office and branch offices in such locations as it may determine. It may establish regional offices and determine the location of, and the areas to be covered by, each regional office. It may make arrangements with public or private organizations at the regional, State, and local levels, including banking organizations and other financing institutions, to act as agents or otherwise to assist the bank in the conduct of its business.

(f) To carry out the foregoing purposes, the bank shall have such additional powers as are necessary or appropriate in carrying out this Act.

OPERATING PRINCIPLES

SEC. 8. The operations of the bank shall be conducted in accordance with the following principles:

(1) The bank shall undertake its financing, technical assistance, and other operations on such terms and conditions and for such fees as it considers appropriate, taking into account the requirements of the enterprise, the risks being undertaken by the bank, the benefits to the rural community or to the residents of such communities, and the conditions under which similar financing might be available from private investors.

(2) The bank shall maintain such liaison or consultation with other departments, agencies, or instrumentalities of the Government as may be necessary to insure that its operations are carried out in a manner which will supplement and not duplicate the operations and functions of any other department, agency, or instrumentality of the Government.

(3) The bank shall consult with and shall seek to encourage local banking and other financial institutions to participate in its financing and other activities.

(4) The bank shall, to the extent feasible, give emphasis in its activities to providing financing and other assistance to facilities owned in whole or in part by residents of rural communities or to facilities in which such ownership is made available to such persons.

(5) The bank shall seek to revolve its funds by selling its loans, loans guaranteed by it, and other investments to private investors whenever it can do so on satisfactory terms.

(6) The bank shall be subject to the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 841 et seq.) in the same manner and to the same extent as if it were included in the definition of "wholly owned Government corporation" as set forth in section 101 of that Act (31 U.S.C. 846).

(7) The bank shall pay a return out of net income, after providing for reserves and operating expenses, at the rate of 2 per centum per annum on the amounts of class A stock subscription actually paid into the bank. Such return shall be cumulative and shall be payable annually into miscellaneous receipts of the Treasury.

(8) The bank shall adopt such bylaws as may be necessary for the conduct of its business and the management of its affairs and may adopt such additional rules and regulations as are necessary and appropriate for carrying out the provisions of this Act.

LIMITATIONS ON FINANCING

SEC. 9. (a) The bank shall not provide financing or other assistance for any commercial or industrial facility, supporting public or private development facility, or housing necessarily related, unless it determines that—

(1) other public or private financing could not be obtained on reasonable terms and conditions;

(2) adequate arrangements have been made to insure that the proceeds of any loan or other financing are used only for the purpose for which the financing was provided, with due attention to considerations of economy and efficiency;

(3) the borrower or other recipient of financing has adequate equity or other financial interest in or income from the facility to insure his or its careful and businesslike management of the project;

(4) the governing body of the city or, as appropriate, the governing body of the county, parish, or other political subdivision in which the facility is located or is to be established, or an agency or other instrumentality of such political subdivision designated by such body, has certified to the bank its approval of (A) the establishment of the facility at the particular location, (B) the proposed standards of construction and design, and (C) provisions for the relocation of any residents or businesses to be displaced; and

(5) the establishment, expansion, or preservation of the facility in the particular location will contribute to the level of economic opportunity for residents of the community and contribute to the general development of the community.

(b) The bank shall not provide financing for any commercial or industrial facility which has been relocated from one area to another, except that this requirement may be waived by the Board of Directors if it determines (1) that the establishment of such facility in the new location will not result in an increase of unemployment in the area of original location or in any other area where the enterprise conducts business operations, or (2) that such facility is not being established in the new location with any intention of closing down the operations of the enterprise in the area of original location or in any other area where the enterprise conducts its operations.

EXEMPTION FROM TAXES

SEC. 10. Except as specifically provided in this Act, the bank, including its capital and reserves or surplus and income derived therefrom, shall be exempt from Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation, except taxes upon real estate held, purchased, or taken by the bank under the provisions of this Act. The security instruments executed to the bank and the bonds, obligations, debentures, issued under the provisions of this Act shall be deemed and held to be instruments of the Government of the United States, and as such they and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS

AMENDMENTS NOS. 1767 AND 1768

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure of the Committee on the Judiciary, will continue hearings on the witness protection program. The hearings will be on April 14, 1978, in room S–126, the Capitol and will begin at 9:30 a.m.●

CHANGE IN HEARING ON JUSTICE DEPARTMENT AUTHORIZATION

● Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on March 10, I gave notice that a hearing on the budget request of the Civil Rights Division of the Department of Justice would be held on April 11, 1978. The time of this hearing has now been changed to April 25, 1978, at 2 o'clock p.m. in room 2228 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.●

FOREIGN AGRICULTURAL POLICY SUBCOMMITTEE

● Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I wish to alert my colleagues to the plan of the Foreign Agricultural Policy Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry to hold hearings on April 27 and 28 to examine legislation designed to expand our agricultural export markets.

There has been widespread interest in expanding our agricultural exports which are important to our balance of payments. I would hate to imagine the state of the dollar today if it were not for our agricultural exports. Last year our agricultural exports reached $24 billion with a net favorable balance of over $10 billion. There are a number of key issues which the hearings will address and my subcommittee will be reviewing as we examine the opportunities for legislation in this area.

Bills introduced to date on which the hearing will focus on S. 2385 (HUMPHREY), S. 2405 (LUGAR), and S. 2504 (DOLE).

We will have a group of invited witnesses, but written statements will be accepted for the record. The hearing will begin at 9 on April 27 and 10 on April 28 in room 324 RSOB. Anyone requiring further information should contact the committee at 224–2035.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

HUMAN RIGHTS IN EASTERN EUROPE

● Mr. CASE. Mr. President, Senate Concurrent Resolution 75 reemphasizes the need to keep the Soviet Union and other countries on notice that they have made major human rights promises to their citizens by signing the 1975 Helsinki accord.

The Conference which ended recently in Belgrade reviewed the Helsinki accord as part of the process. The resolution, which the senior Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) introduced April 6, was a joint effort, as we are the two senior Senate members of the Helsinki Commission. It makes it clear that we are looking forward to continuing reviews of human rights situations in Eastern Europe.

The resolution urges the President and other executive branch officials to continue to express, at every suitable opportunity and in the strongest terms, the opposition of the American people to repressive actions and violations of basic human rights which are contrary to the Helsinki accord. Furthermore, the resolution, which also has been introduced in the House of Representatives, urges executive branch officials, including the President, to use every feasible bilateral contact with officials of East European countries to remind them of the past promises on human rights.

The Belgrade Conference brought out into the open some of the violations. The U.S. delegation headed by Arthur Goldberg, is commended in the resolution for its efforts. Because of the dedication and concern of Mr. Goldberg and some of the other officials, the presentation was much stronger than it would have been had the delegation style been set by the traditional approach of the bureaucracy.

Some observers were disappointed that the concluding document adopted at the end of the Belgrade Conference was not more specific on the human rights issue. But in view of the nature of the situation, there may have been unrealistic expectations. It is not generally realized that the concluding document had to be unanimously agreed to—in other words the Soviet Union and even Malta had to agree to the final language. The way the Soviets stonewalled on any mention of human rights on the concluding document is an indication of how strongly they were stung at the mention of human rights at Belgrade.

One of the accomplishments of the Belgrade Conference is that review sessions will be held at regular intervals—the next meeting will be in Madrid in 1980. The important thing is that the process of spotlighting human rights violations continue as part of the effort to encourage Soviet officials to abide by the promises of the Helsinki accord and the United Nations Declaration on Human Rights. The U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe on which I served will continue its efforts in this process.

For example the Commission has been following the disturbing way in which Soviet officials have used psychiatric treatment and hospitals as a way of punishing dissidents. The Commission also has been gathering information on the subhuman living conditions in the Soviet Union. The Commission staff reports that as part of the Moscow Helsinki Watch Group, five Soviet citizens have formed the Working Commission To Investigate the Abuse of Psychiatry for Political Purposes.

The Commission issues reports on the situation of Soviets subjected to punitive psychiatry. In August 1977, a member of this Commission, Feliks Serebrov, was arrested and then sentenced to camp for using falsified documents. In November 1977, another member of this group, Aleksandr Podrabinek, was ordered to emigrate from the Soviet Union with his brother and father or face criminal charges. In December 1977, Kirill Podrabinek was arrested and recently was sentenced to 2½ years of prison camp for possession of weapons.

Sentencing of dissidents on phony criminal charges is a favorite "new" method of the Soviet Government in trying to silence dissent. In the last few weeks, for example, a member of the Georgian Helsinki Group, Grigory Goldshtein, has been sentenced to 1 year in camp for "parasitism"—he lost his job when he applied to emigrate to Israel in 1971. In the Ukraine, Pyotr Vins—son of the imprisoned Baptist pastor, Georgy Vins—is now facing a trial on charges of parasitism after having applied to emigrate to relatives in Canada.

Despite the vote in Honolulu at a meeting of the World Psychiatric Association condemning the Soviet practice of punitive psychiatry against dissidents and religious believers, Amnesty International reported recently that since that time, there are 14 known cases of psychiatric incarceration of dissenters. One such reported victim is Vladimir Klebanov, organizer of an unofficial trade union in the U.S.S.R., who is said to be in a Donetsk psychiatric hospital. Two other victims of this cynical practice are Zviad Gamsakhurdia and Merab Kostava of the Georgian Helsinki Watch Group who underwent "tests" at the Serbsky Institute for Forensic Psychiatry in Moscow before being sent back to Georgia to await trial for their monitoring work.

Twelve prisoners of Mordovian Camp No. 19 undertook a hunger strike from April 19 until July 27, 1977—an action timed to coincide with the preparatory session of the Belgrade Conference. Their appeal is also addressed to my colleagues in the Congress, listing 12 categories of denial of their rights:

First. Political prisoners are in the same legal category as criminal offenders;

Second. There is secret legislation relating only to political prisoners;

Third. The labor of political prisoners is cruelly taxed and exploited in a 48-hour workweek;

Fourth. The almost total absence of rights to legal defense and redress of grievances;

Fifth. A deliberate policy of gradual starvation—including a ban on food parcels for the first half of a sentence;

Sixth. The denial of their human dignity—each camp is surrounded by six barbed wire fences and manned with guards carrying machineguns;

Seventh. Discrimination against religious prisoners—neither religious services nor Bibles are allowed;

Eighth. Ethnic discrimination—prisoners often serve their sentences outside their native republics, especially in the case of Armenians and Georgians;

Ninth. It is illegal for prisoners to get married and difficult to have contact with existing family—they request three to four family visits per year;

Tenth. The forcible political indoctrination of prisoners;

Eleventh. Depriving prisoners of their professional qualifications, by banning books in their fields of expertise and by confiscating their work; and Twelfth. Deliberately isolating camps from the rest of the world—by detaining and confiscating personal correspondence.

One of the prisoners active in this hunger strike was Vladimir Osipeov. Editor of an independent Russian Orthodox journal, sentenced to an 8-year prison term in 1975 for his publishing activities. The Sakharovs have made known another hunger strike in this Mordovian camp by Eduard Kuznetsov, 1 of the 10 still imprisoned defendants of the first Leningrad trial in 1970. It seems that the Soviets have heeded the appeals on behalf of Mr. Kuznetsov's relatives who wish to visit him and have promised his wife, Sylva Zalmanson, that she will be allowed into the U.S.S.R. from Europe to visit her husband.

Few positive signs can be seen in this dismal picture of Soviet "respect" for human rights. One must have serious doubts about the sincerity of the Soviets when they undertake commitments in international agreements—such as those they undertook at Helsinki in 1975. I call on my colleagues to continue to make known their views on this subject, for the pressure of world opinion can have an effect on the Soviet authorities.●

DOE URGED TO REMOVE OBSTACLES TO GASOHOL SALES

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, the Economic Regulatory Administration of the Department of Energy is holding public hearings today on proposed regulations to facilitate the sale of gasohol. I submit a copy of my comments on these regulations for the RECORD.

The comments follow:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., April 10, 1978.

DAVID J. BARDIN,
Administrator, Economic Regulatory Administration, Office of Public Hearings Management, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ADMINISTRATOR BARDIN: I welcome the opportunity to comment on the Economic Regulatory Administration's proposed regulations to facilitate the sale of gasohol and fully support the Department's moving quickly ahead to remove all barriers to the addition of gasohol to our energy mix.

The intent of ERA's proposed regulations is clear. Current ERA pricing regulations prohibit gasoline retailers from including the extra costs of gasohol in their customer charges. The proposed regulations would permit retailers to pass the cost of the alcohol in gasohol through to their customers and leave the decision about gasohol purchases to consumers.

All indications we have from those who have offered this new product to their customers is that it is a best seller. In fact, service station dealers and farm cooperatives in Illinois and Nebraska that have offered this product report that their customers can't get enough of it. These distributors should not have to suffer economic hardship to meet their customers' demand for gasohol. In addition, in my estimation, the government should be doing all it can to promote gasohol—90/10 gasoline/alcohol blends—because it is the only hope we have of significantly reducing our dependence on petroleum in the near-term. I would like to take a few moments to elaborate on the importance of introducing gasohol into our energy mix.

Last spring, the President addressed the nation to unveil his national energy plan. He emphasized the critical importance of an effective national energy policy and likened the effort needed to meet this challenge to the "moral equivalent of war."

I have been encouraged by the high priority placed by the President on resolving our energy problems, and supported most of his efforts strongly over the past year. However, a crucial ingredient missing from the President's national energy plan was an accelerated program for developing and introducing alternative energy sources—especially new liquid fuels—into our energy mix in a timely fashion.

The President himself, as well as other Administration officials, has recognized that a liquid fuels crunch is soon in the offing, despite our temporary oil glut. It is hard to predict with certainty when world demand for oil will overtake production. However, President Carter and Secretary Schlesinger have predicted that this is likely sometime in the 1980's.

Even with our best efforts to conserve energy and curtail all nonessential uses of crude oil products, our economy and society will continue to require a reliable source of liquid fuels for the rest of this century. Right now, highway vehicles alone consume 40 percent of our petroleum-based energy. American drivers use 103 billion gallons of gasoline per year, or almost 1½ million barrels of crude oil per day.

Despite increasingly fuel efficient cars and trucks, and more widespread mass transit facilities, transportation needs will continue to make a major claim on our liquid energy supplies. The same can be said for other functions in our society that require liquid fuels, and will continue to do so, despite our best efforts at increased conservation and conversion. Peak load electricity generation and certain industrial processes will require liquid fuels well into the next century. Our farmers will need liquid fuels to run their farm equipment and get their crops to market. Residential and commercial uses will also demand their share.

We must move ahead, as other nations such as Brazil, Sweden, and Germany are already doing, to develop viable alternatives to petroleum to meet these needs. If we do not, our future looks very bleak indeed. Failure to act soon will consign us to even greater petroleum imports, already approaching 50 percent of our crude oil needs at a cost close to $45 billion per year, horrendous balance-of-payment deficits, further erosion of the value of the dollar, higher unemployment, increased dependence on unstable foreign suppliers, and very real threats to our economic well-being and national security.

Faced with these undesirable consequences, it is clear to me that we must start a concerted effort to develop new liquid fuels that can become commercially viable in the short run, which are plentiful or derived from renewable domestic resources, and which can be used for a variety of purposes.

Alcohol fuels is one possibility that has been vastly underestimated, although it is within our reach in the relatively short term, without major disruptions to our economy and society. Testing by the U.S., Germany, and Brazil has confirmed that gasohol performs more than adequately as a motor fuel. It boosts octane, reduces some emissions, eliminates knock problems, improves mileage and requires no modification of current automotive engine design. While other governments, in cooperation with the private sector, are moving aggressively ahead to tap their nation's abundant resources and reduce their reliance on imported petroleum, the U.S. government has lagged far behind.

Those with a vested in maintaining the status quo, or those uneasy with change, raise all kinds of objections to alcohol fuels. They say they cost too much. They say they are energy inefficient. They say they are impractical. They say they require change.

The irony of this posture is that technical and economic problems equally, if not more, complex than those faced with respect to alcohol fuels existed when the petroleum industry was in its infancy. The idea of drilling holes thousands of feet in the ground and transporting oil around the globe struck some people as absurd. But Washington was more than generous in the supporters provided the oil companies before petroleum became a preferred fuel. The industry enjoyed import quotas, depletion allowances, intangible drilling deductions, and foreign tax credits; in fact, oil companies still derive some of their profits from these hidden subsidies.

I have no doubt that alcohol fuels can become efficient and economical energy supplements with a relatively small federal investment if we apply our best technology to this effort and remove the red tape that currently inhibits its sale.

The Department of Energy is now conducting an energy supply study and will soon be forwarding recommendations to the Congress as to what types of federal subsidies or incentives it feels warranted to develop new supplies, given the need for new energy sources in the 1980's, and the lead times involved in developing new production facilities. Indications are that it will suggest costly new programs justified by the nation's future needs.

The regulations under consideration today will not cost the government a penny. They will merely permit gasohol marketers to charge fair prices for their product. The consumer will decide whether the advantages associated with gasohol warrant paying a few extra pennies for it.

I urge the Department to move quickly to eliminate unintended regulatory obstacles to the sale of this promising petroleum extender and to make these regulations retroactive to January 17, 1978, the effective date of the temporary stay issued by DOE. In addition, I urge the Department to allow a reasonable period of time to elapse before setting a final ceiling price, so that accurate cost estimates can be developed.

I am confident that alcohol fuels will draw broad based support from the American people, the business, farm and scientific communities, and those of us who serve them. Use of this product will likely improve automobile performance and give every member of the driving public a role in increasing our energy independence.

We are on the verge of developing a range of new energy technologies that will not only reduce our reliance on foreign sources of energy, but will give a boost to local economies all around the nation. It is safe to say that alcohol fuels—ethanol and methanol—can be produced in virtually every state of the union. Ethanol can be produced from such diverse sources as corn, wheat, milo, sugarbeets, sugarcane, potatoes, algae, and distressed crops and crop residues, as well as numerous other "energy crops" that our plant geneticists could doubtless develop if given the go-ahead. Methanol can be produced from forestry products, crop residues, wood and municipal wastes and coal.

In sum, I believe that the development of alcohol fuels can make a major contribution to curbing oil imports while creating new uses for our most abundant domestic resources and helping depressed economies in different regions of the country. These fuels also have the potential to relieve urban areas of some of their waste disposal problems and budgetary drains by developing a new use for the byproducts of industrial and urban life. DOE should remove all obstacles to its voluntary sale in the marketplace.

Sincerely,

BIRCH BAYH,
U.S. Senator.●

THE AUTONOMY OF FANNIE MAE

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, over the last couple of months, I have become increasingly concerned about some activities relating to the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

Late last year our distinguished colleague and my good friend, the senior Senator from Missouri, Mr. EAGLETON, held a public hearing on the conversion of the Federal flood insurance programs from a private enterprise operation into another undertaking by the Federal Government.

Somewhat more recently, HUD has undergone still another reorganization and one that adversely affects the people in my State. HUD is in the process of completely dismantling the FHA-insuring office in Albuquerque. In its multifamily operations this office was second to none and yet somehow, someway, this kind of success could not be allowed to continue.

More recently, and within the last couple of weeks, I have been hearing from a number of my constituents who are involved not only in housing construction but in home finance. They are concerned about the efforts of the Department of Housing and Urban Development to take over the operations of the Federal National Mortgage Association. Fannie Mae, as it is more commonly known is a company Congress set up in 1968 as a privately owned, privately managed, and privately capitalized undertaking.

Having read the Senate committee report on the 1968 Housing Act, I and apparently many others thought the Congress was vesting in Fannie Mae's Board of Directors the full power and responsibility for the policies of the Corporation, subject only to the provisions of the laws passed by the Congress and the regulations of the HUD Secretary. This regulatory authority, however, was necessary only to protect the financial interest of the Federal Government and to assure that the purposes of the Fannie Mae Charter Act was carried out.

Mr. President, I have no problem with some aspects of the regulations which HUD proposed on February 24 to govern Fannie Mae's operations, particularly those that call for the submission of the reports and other data to the Secretary.

I am deeply concerned and my constituents are deeply concerned about the attempt of HUD to say where and when Fannie Mae is to buy mortgages. My staff brought to my attention a colloquy between the first Secretary of HUD, Dr. Robert C. Weaver, and our distinguished friend, the senior Senator from New Hampshire, Senator MCINTYRE. In that colloquy in the Senate committee, Secretary Weaver said in effect that under the HUD regulatory authority—and the authority of the incumbent Secretary is certainly no greater—the HUD Secretary would not be able to tell Fannie Mae to invest here or to buy that.

My constituents and I are both concerned among other things that HUD seeks to require of Fannie Mae that 30 percent of its mortgages must involve housing for low and moderate income families. Now, while I certainly want to see that our low and moderate income families are properly housed, there are other ways—such as using FHA and GNMA—which appear to be the better route.

In my own State of New Mexico, Fannie Mae has done a reasonably good job. For example, at the end of calendar 1977, Fannie Mae's mortgage portfolio was in excess of $367.5 million. A very substantial number of these mortgages were on single family properties. In calendar 1977, Fannie Mae bought in this one year alone over $63.5 million in single-family home loans.

Mr. President, Fannie Mae is not perfect, but it has done, I think, a very creditable job. In the Senate report on the 1968 legislation, there is the statement that the committee expects that the privately owned Fannie Mae will add a significant impetus to the flow of funds in the secondary market and in the availability of credit to the home mortgage market. I think this has happened.

Quite frankly, I think that Fannie Mae should be left alone.

In conclusion, I ask that an editorial from the New York Times of March 25, entitled "No Chaperone for Fannie Mae" be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

NO CHAPERONE FOR FANNIE MAE

Secretary Harris, of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, seems determined to take the privately owned Federal National Mortgage Association under her wing, asserting the right to tell Fannie Mae, as the association is called, how much money it can invest in what kinds of mortgages. Since buying mortgages is Fannie Mae's business and constitutes a strategically important segment of housing finance, Secretary Harris's proposal endangers housing credit in general.

Mrs. Harris accepts the risk because of the importance of her avowed goal: insuring a flow of mortgage money into sound investments in urban areas. After being defeated in the effort to place Presidential appointees on the Fannie Mae board, the Secretary invoked her department's rule-making power. She has proposed a new set of regulations restricting Fannie Mae's freedom to buy or promise to buy mortgages from lending institutions all over the country. The proposals are complicated, but in effect they would require Fannie Mae to use at least 30 percent of its investments in any year for mortgages that "conform" to the Secretary's standards. She favors one-family urban homes, non-F.H.A. mortgages on old houses and mortgages subsidized by the Government. And total lending by the corporation would be limited by the amount of "conforming" mortgages it buys.

No one quarrels with Secretary Harris's proclaimed intention. The question is whether Fannie Mae, especially given rigorous supervision by the Secretary and her successors, is the right instrument.

Since Fannie Mae gets no Government funds, it must sell its own securities to the investing public on the open market. The proposed regulations would surely make these securities less attractive. And they would drastically cut back Fannie Mae's operations and profitability if it could not find enough "conforming" mortgages to fill the quota demand. Fannie Mae makes no mortgages directly so it can do little to enhance the supply of "conforming" loans.

Before imposing the proposed regulations, Secretary Harris should explore more direct ways of increasing the liquidity of urban mortgage lenders. The Government National Mortgage Association, an agency that is intended to execute Federal policy in mortgage purchase and sale, stands at hand. Since it is financed by the Treasury, Ginnie Mae could be given the funds to buy mortgages which "conform" to Mrs. Harris's standards, at prices so attractive that lenders would be encouraged to continue making more of them. Ginnie Mae could also be encouraged to help Fannie Mae market the mortgages it has already bought, with the proviso that returns from such sales be earmarked exclusively for buying new "conforming" mortgages.

Reasonable people, in short, should be able to agree on a Government strategy for reaching the goals that Secretary Harris has identified—and without jeopardizing other important goals of American housing.●

TAXATION OF AMERICANS ABROAD

● Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, over the last few months increased attention has been given to the devastating effects of the Tax Reform Act of 1976 in the area of taxation of Americans residing abroad. Several articles have appeared in the RECORD which have spoken eloquently on vital considerations of international trade which are closely intertwined with the tax treatment accorded American workers overseas.

Regrettably, our country is quickly losing its competitive advantage as a leader among word trading nations, as attested by our enormous trade deficits sustained each month over the last 2 years. The administration has given its commitment to correct this embarrassing situation, yet how can this pledge be taken seriously when its tax reform proposals have the counterproductive effect of providing only nominal tax relief for these Americans?

Mr. President, the international trade aspects to this problem are of critical importance. But there is also a human side to this matter which is often overlooked. I have received a letter from Mrs. Frances R. Hemenway, a resident of Lagos, Nigeria, who graphically relates to me the oppressive living conditions found in that country. I daresay that few American families would have the fortitude to withstand such an intolerable environment with which Mrs. Hemenway and her family must contend with each day. So that my colleagues may better understand the imperative need to provide income relief necessary to insure that these brave Americans have the incentive to carry on their important jobs abroad, I offer Mrs. Hemenway's letter to be printed in today's RECORD.

The letter follows:

MARCH 23, 1978.

Senator JOHN TOWER,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR TOWER: From far off Lagos, Nigeria, I am exercising one of my privileges as a U.S. citizen, by writing letters to Congressmen concerning an issue that affects me very closely—tax treatment of citizens abroad. Having read one senator's views of U.S. citizens who are swathed in mink at Monte Carlo, (as reported in the newspapers), I would like to present to you another picture of a U.S. family working abroad.

Lagos is described by natives and visitors alike as one of the filthiest, most crowded cities in the world. 2.75 million people live in the Lagos metropolitan area, which can be traversed by car from one end to the other in twenty-five minutes—in the darkest hours of the night when all the traffic is gone and no one ventures out but thieves, highway robbers and pirates. Otherwise, to travel from one part of Lagos to another could take up to four hours.

Its very hot here—sitting in a Volkswagen crew cab in traffic, shopping in the un-air conditioned stores, or sitting in my own living room. We have an air conditioner, but only a few hours of electricity a day. So, we have a generator, to keep the food in the refrigerator from spoiling, to pump water from the ground tank to the roof tank so we can have running water in the house, to light up the outside of the house at night for security.

I have a steward, he could be considered a luxury, but I consider him a necessity. Otherwise, I would have to do all the washing by hand in the bathtub (our septic system can't handle a washing machine), iron every bit of washing including towels and socks (to prevent the timbu flies from hatching in our clothing, crawling under our skin and raising boils), spray the entire house daily to keep the spiders, cockroaches, beetles, and ants from becoming too numerous; boil and filter all water for drinking, cooking, and ice cubes because our water is delivered by tank truck and looks as though it were straight from the Rouge River; sweep and dust every inch of the house daily because we have dust storms called Harmattans that lay sand on every surface; and scrub the entire house with Lysol because even the air here carries germs that cause fungus and other infections of the ear, throat, and skin.

I do the shopping for my family—every day. Depending on the season and availability. I pay: $3.24 for one dozen eggs; $1.05 for one cucumber; $4.50 for one pound green beans; $5.00 for medium head of cauliflower; $3.50 for small head of cabbage; $2.25 for one pound onions; $3.00 for one pineapple; $6.00 for 2½ pound frying chicken.

All these items are grown or processed here in Nigeria. I also buy imported food, when available. I pay: $5.18 for lg. jar mayonaise; $4.50 for one pound hot dogs; $12.00 for one bottle gin; $2.25 for 8-oz. box Rice Chex; $3.00 for a liter vegetable oil; $33.00 for 10-lb. turkey (for Christmas).

I don't buy canned fruit, vegetables or juices; crackers, cookies, candy; bread or cake mixes; linens, plastic wares, or champagne because the government has banned the import of these items.

My daughter attends an American International School which costs $4000 per year. Her classes are from 7:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. with no break, no music, no P.E., no sports, no school clubs, or extracurricular activities. She has some American friends but few opportunities after school hours for socializing, and no opportunities for corner drugstore, movies, American holiday activities, walking, bicycling.

My husband works from 7:00 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday–Friday, half-days on Saturday. He eats a sandwich at his desk for lunch, communicates with the parent company by telex, and is responsible for housing, transportation, communication, health and legal services for the expatriates and their families who are here in Nigeria, in addition to his job: supervising construction projects. He has been here through two government crises, responsible for the safety, sanity and work production of expatriates who are here because there are no jobs for them in the States, and most of whom left their families back there.

We're not in Lagos because we want to be. Our company had very little work in the U.S., but lots of opportunities overseas. However, they're in the business of making a profit, and we can save money only by living on a scale light years removed from that we enjoyed in the U.S., not only materially, but culturally and qualitatively. We miss contact with family and friends. Our opportunities to travel are bounded by the cost of air fare to Europe, the dangers of travel in many parts of Africa, the demands of my husband's job, our daughter's school schedule, and the inevitable health problems that confine all of us at one time or other: despite all precautions and American drugs we fall victim to malaria, dysentery, food poisoning, infectious hepatitis, ulcers, boils, and industrial accidents.

We're here because there's a job to be done. There isn't enough money in the world to make up for the cultural lag; premature tropical agin, ; missed weddings, funerals, and holidays; election campaigns; Oscar-winning movies; the change of seasons; fresh milk; respect for law and order; books, plays, and the World Series. We endure slurs on our country, attacks on our very presence here, and discomforts that Americans at home can't imagine.

Very truly yours,

FRANCES R. HEMENWAY.●

ASSISTANCE TO WAR VICTIMS IN LEBANON

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, recent violence in the Middle East has caused much tragedy to many people on all sides. But of immediate concern today are the staggering humanitarian problems resulting from the Israeli military action in southern Lebanon and the sporadic conflict which has gripped that area in recent months.

As I suggested in a public statement a few days ago, the United States must give its full support to international efforts to help bring peace to the area. But we must also support the efforts of the Lebanese Government to help bring relief to the people who live there.

The record is clear that for the residents of southern Lebanon—many with relatives and friends in the United States—recent times have been a nightmare of fear and death and brief. Hundreds of people have been injured or killed, and unexploded ordnance apparently continues to threaten the lives of many people. An estimated 200,000 Lebanese nationals and 65,000 Palestine refugees—two-thirds of the population in the affected areas—have fled their homes as refugees. Houses, schools, and public buildings have been damaged or destroyed. Refugee camps and villages have been devastated. And this new tragedy in Lebanon is adding heavily to the lingering human problems brought on by the general civil conflict in that country just a short time ago.

Emergency relief needs continue. Medical supplies are still needed to treat the wounded and sick. And longer term rehabilitation and reconstruction assistance will surely be needed to help the war victims rebuild their homes and normalize their lives.

Although a full assessment of humanitarian needs in southern Lebanon is still underway, the Lebanese Government, various international humanitarian organizations and a number of private voluntary agencies have issued appeals in behalf of the war victims in southern Lebanon. And a general United Nations appeal for both emergency relief and rehabilitation assistance is expected sometime soon.

I want to commend the administration for contributing, on an urgent basis, over $1.2 million in relief supplies to help meet immediate shelter, food, and medical needs. But I am also hopeful that our country will respond more generously to the serious humanitarian needs in Lebanon, and will join with other countries in fully responding to the international appeals now underway. Some funds for this purpose are immediately available, and, if additional funds are needed, I am hopeful the President will urgently request them of Congress.

Mr. President, peace and relief are urgently needed in Lebanon—to save lives, to renew the spirit of a battered people, to assist in the rebuilding of a country torn by conflict and violence, and to promote the stability and peaceful development of the entire region. Hopefully, all concerned with events in the Middle East will work to accomplish these ends.●

HOW TO REINVIGORATE SMALL BUSINESS

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, ever since the birth of our great Nation, the dream of every American included the opportunity to be one's own boss. Our history of individual entrepreneurship is long and filled with many success stories. We in the Congress have, as well, long supported the idea that every American should be afforded every opportunity to partake of that dream.

But in the last few years, in our zeal to provide badly needed social services and to protect individual Americans from numerous hazards and practices, we have unwittingly created a hostile environment within which small businesses have trouble thriving. The stories about individuals rising from rags to riches through individual initiative are becoming fewer and fewer.

I believe an article in the April 1978 issue of the Ripon Forum entitled "How to Reinvigorate Small Business" articulates these problems quite well. The author of that article, Mr. John C. Topping, Jr., does not stop there, however. He goes on to prescribe what I think is a well reasoned prescription to reinvigorate small business. I believe that the plan Mr. Topping outlines is sound and further that we should take a leading role in insuring that this road to the American dream is not lost.

I commend this article to my colleagues and ask it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

HOW TO REINVIGORATE SMALL BUSINESS

(By John C. Topping, Jr.)

Small business is the politician's equivalent of the weather; everyone talks about it, but no one does much about it. The state of both the weather and small business has worsened appreciably since January 20, 1977. The rotten turn of weather in the Carter era seems to be pure coincidence; the development of an increasingly foreboding climate for small business is, however, somewhat more the product of Administration action and inaction.

Shortly after the election, Carter enthusiasts were advancing the fanciful claim that the Georgia politician was the first small businessman ever to become President.[1] Such hyperbole has developed an increasingly hollow ring amidst the mounting evidence that Administration action has worsened the already perilous position of small business.

The more hostile climate for small business is not the product of a conscious design; instead it is the result of a series of seemingly unrelated policies. By far the most inimical of these to small business has been the Administration's effort to bail out the financially threatened Social Security system in large part by huge hikes in Social Security taxes paid by employers.[2]

A secondary cause of this worsened climate for small business has been the recent rise in the Federal minimum wage of more than 15 percent. In addition to freezing many relatively unskilled youth from the job market, this jump in the minimum wage has placed a considerable cost squeeze on many small and medium-sized businesses.[3]

Despite these recently escalating pressures, American small business, including much of the legal and medical profession, still constitutes a significant sector of our economy. The statistics which tend to be dated and to have limited reliability indicate that firms with less than a million dollars in annual income have produced between a third to a fourth of our national business receipts since the early 1960's.[4] Perhaps, as Neil Jacoby suggests,[5] it is hyperbole to characterize our economy as a manifestation of the corporate state.

Nevertheless, in the last few years a number of factors have weighed increasingly heavily on small or new businesses, and particularly on aggressive risk-taking firms in new technology areas. These factors impeding entrepreneurial entry and growth include:

Federal, state and local regulatory requirements which raise the cost and difficulty of entry into areas of business;

Manipulation of government regulatory mechanisms by established firms in order to restrict entry by competitors;

Drastically lessened availability of venture capital for new or small businesses;

A dramatic skewing of economic incentives against self employment and entrepreneurial activity and in favor of those who derive their principal income from someone else's payroll.

Although these problems have yet to transform our economy, their adverse impact is generally more severe on incipient innovative firms than on mature industrial giants.

REGULATION AS A SPUR TO MARKET CONCENTRATION

The rapid growth of governmental regulation has often raised the cost and lengthened the time required for business entry into certain industries or product areas. In many instances, manufacturers must obtain prior approval of one or more agencies such as the Food and Drug Administration, the Environmental Protection Agency or the Department of Agriculture before they can market a new product.

The effect of pre-entry clearances is particularly severe on incipient, modestly capitalized businesses. Unlike huge manufacturing concerns, small businesses rarely have on tap a legion of lobbyist/lawyers to smooth over their difficulties with the Washington regulatory establishment. The political clout and access to highly placed Federal decision makers of a fledgling manufacturer rarely compares with that of a Fortune 500 firm.

The long lead time and associated legal and administrative costs occasioned by pre-entry clearance requirements result in front-end costs which may effectively preclude a modestly capitalized firm from developing a new product or process. A giant corporation, on the other hand, is much better able to take the risks of securing pre-entry clearances. Its normally greater sophistication in clearing regulatory hurdles gives it a greater chance of success in obtaining the necessary clearances. Furthermore, once its product has received the necessary regulatory approvals, the super corporation, heavily capitalized and equipped with a sophisticated marketing and distribution capacity, is well positioned to recapture quickly its front-end investment.

CENTRALIZING INNOVATION

The disproportionate impact of regulatory barriers on market entry by modestly capitalized firms tends to enhance market concentration. But this may not be the most troubling aspect. The most detrimental result of such regulation may be a serious slowdown in the rate of technological innovation. Small businesses and individual inventors, despite their limited capital base, have been the prime source of technological innovation in America. A leading business analyst, Arthur Burck, recently observed, "Small companies and individual inventors were responsible for a remarkable percentage of the important inventions and innovations of this century; these include the air conditioner, power steering, xerography, cyclotron, cotton picker, helicopter, FM circuits, automatic transmissions, zipper, Polaroid camera, cellophane, continuous hot-strip rolling of steel, and the oxygen steelmaking process. The Jewkes study of invention showed that of 61 basic inventions examined only 16 resulted from research by large companies."[6]

It is possible that this historical pattern may not be fully applicable to our present economy, in which many technological breakthroughs require huge sums of front-end capital. Nevertheless, there is undeniable loss to the economy if, as seems increasingly the case, incipient firms are impeded by heavy handed regulation from both product development and capitalization.

CORNERING THE MARKET

In addition, the regulatory structure may be actively manipulated by established corporations to fence out competition. A particularly glaring example of this has occurred in the field of computer data transmission.

American Telephone and Telegraph Company (AT&T) dominates this field. In the late 1960's Sam Wyly, a young Dallas computer executive and business innovator, mapped out plans for a national microwave data transmission network to compete with AT&T. Wyly poured millions of his own money into Datran, the corporation he had set up to develop the data transmission network, and raised millions more.

But AT&T resisted tooth and nail, fighting Datran and other microwave transmission applicants in a protracted battle before the FCC and the courts. After losing these rounds, which bled the microwave applicants, AT&T applied its economic muscle to cut away their markets. Recently, Datran, despite the technological superiority of its data transmission process, was forced to fold before AT&T's superior might. Datran

[1] Among the several Presidents who could claim prior small business experience were Warren Harding (successful newspaper publisher in Marion, Ohio) Herbert Hoover (very successful engineer) and Harry Truman (unsuccessful haberdasher).

[2] The finally enacted Social Security bill provided for hikes in Social Security taxes that will amount to $227 billion in yearly collections within ten years. About half of this tax bite would be visited on employers. The Administration sought legislation placing a far higher burden on employers.

[3] Some of the smallest businesses are exempt from such coverage but numerous restaurants, cafeterias, fast food franchise outlets, gas stations and small manufacturers are affected.

was left with a lawsuit against AT&T, but for the time being that communications monopoly remained preeminent in the burgeoning field of computer data transmission.

Not content with its current advantage over new entrants, AT&T is now involved together with other telephone companies in a massive lobbying effort to secure Congressional legislation overturning Federal Communications Commission moves to permit greater competition in the communications industry.

Anti-competitive actions by established firms are even more prevalent in the transportation industry. Small truckers or trunk airlines find that government regulatory agencies serve as the lynchpin of cartels designed to keep out new entrants. Established firms readily avail themselves of governmentally-sanctioned tactics, such as filing petitions of protest to deny new applicants any grants of operating authority.

In addition to manipulating the regulatory process to fence out competition, some giant corporations may by their very size have a de facto immunity to particularly adverse consequences of government regulation. A vivid example of this phenomenon could be seen recently in the auto industry.

The major U.S. automobile manufacturers announced that they would be unable to meet air pollution standards mandated for 1978 model cars. Hence, they would have to close down their assembly lines unless Congress modified the law. Congress changed the law; it wasn't about to risk the closing down of a major industry.

Somehow it is hard to imagine Congress reacting in the same way if the president of a company employing 50 persons announced that he would close down his business unless Congress changed legislation he found offensive. Small business may be important in the abstract, but the demise of any single firm is not likely to be viewed as a national or regional calamity.

THE DRYING UP OF VENTURE CAPITAL

An additional factor hindering the growth of new businesses has been an enormous shrinkage in the availability of venture capital. As Arthur Burck states, "In the credit crunch in the early 70's, small companies were the first to feel the impact of curtailed bank lending; the situation worsened when the economy slid into recession and available funds flowed to more credit-worthy risks—the larger companies. In the meantime public equity capital disappeared amid the slipping stock market of 1973. In 1972 small companies raised $918 million in 418 underwritings, by 1975 the figures had shrunk to $16 million in four underwritings. At the same time, private venture capital also withdrew." [7]

Numerous factors contributed to the virtual disappearance of a market for new issues of stock. Many investors, having been burned in the speculative new issues markets as late as 1973, were hesitant to take similar risks. The increasing domination of the market by institutional investors, normally inclined to invest in established firms, has also reduced the availability of public venture capital to new firms. Furthermore, many pension fund trustees have interpreted the fiduciary requirements of the new pension law (ERISA) as virtually mandating that they restrict their funds' stock investments to blue chips.

SHRINKING LONG TERM CAPITAL

Together with the virtual disappearance of publicly raised equity capital for new issues, there has been a shrinking of private venture capital for new firms. This is a more disturbing development from the standpoint of new business starts.

Public stock offerings are rarely used to launch a corporation. Instead they are normally employed to finance the expansion of a company that has been started with private venture capital. The vastly more complex securities law requirements applicable to public stock offerings would often rule out such a route for a small firm, even if investor financing were readily available.

The huge hikes in recent years in capital gains taxes have significantly contributed to the drying up of the private venture capital market. Raises in Federal long term capital gains rates, together with state and city capital gains taxes, have combined to produce a long term capital gains rate, sometimes in excess of 50 percent. The doubling of the holding period for long term capital gains effectuated by the Tax Reform Act of 1976 further restricts the attractiveness of investments in high growth potential stock.

Self avowed tax reformers at high levels in the current Administration seem intent, whenever the time is ripe, to move for the elimination of any remaining tax preferences for capital gains. But today, the effective rate of taxation on long term capital gains may already exceed the effective tax rate on earned income; e.g. wages and salaries.

Some states, such as Massachusetts, tax capital gains at a much higher rate than wage or salary income. For some residents of such states, capital gains income may already be less attractive than other forms of income. Moreover, the failure of the tax law to allow for inflation in the value of the adjusted base used for computing capital gains may create a situation where an investor may be exposed to capital gains tax even though the value of his assets as measured in constant dollars has declined.

The attraction of private venture capital investments historically has been based on the higher "upside" potential of such investments as compared to investments in public stock offerings. The comparative advantage of such investments, even when the investment is highly successful, has been lessened enormously in light of the high capital gains tax rates. At the same time, the risk of such investments is normally much higher than that for investments in publicly traded stock or in bonds.

DISINCENTIVES TO ENTREPRENEURSHIP

Even more detrimental than the public policies virtually evaporating outside investor capital for new and small enterprises have been the growing disincentives to entrepreneurship resulting from a combination of governmental action and social and economic trends. Capital is of little utility without the commitment of an entrepreneur or group of entrepreneurs willing to take the economic, emotional, and even physical risks of starting or developing a business.

Congressional action in the last decade has enormously magnified the gap between Federal civilian employees and the private sector. The October, 1977 Federal employee pay hike of 7.05 percent jumped the average annual salary of Federal civilian employees to about $17 thousand. This is about $5 thousand higher than the average annual salary in private nonfarm jobs.

The pay differential is in fact much higher, since Federal employee fringe benefits, e.g retirement pay, health benefits, sick leave and vacation pay, are far more generous than those prevailing in the private sector. Moreover, job security in the Federal civil service normally far exceeds that of private sector employment.

Even within the private sector, financial considerations often make self employment relatively unattractive as compared to work in a large corporation or other institution. Such employment rarely carries with it the nearly absolute job security of the career Federal service. Nevertheless, it often includes generous pay, extensive fringe benefits, and fairly limited working hours.

While the entrepreneur may not have to worry about being fired, his job will disappear if his business fails. So may his family's life savings. In contrast to the average civil servant or mid-level employee of many private firms, he is likely to work much longer hours, often for less net compensation. For many self employed individuals, fringe benefits, particularly vacation time and retirement pay, are unattainable luxuries.

Despite the liberalization of tax provisions concerning Keogh Plans and Individual Retirement Accounts, many self employed individuals lack the resources to invest in any sort of pension plan. Often, a potential entrepreneur may find that he can make a better income in a salaried job, have greater financial security and count on spending much more time with his family.

NEED FOR ECONOMIC INCENTIVES

A significant financial inducement to entrepreneurship, particularly in the startup of new technology firms, has been the lesser tax rate on income classified as a long term capital gain. A risk taker could count on keeping a significant portion of his gain if his idea paid off. Yet, recent hikes in the capital gains tax discussed earlier in this paper have all but obliterated this inducement.

These changes in the capital gains law have apparently already slowed the movement of highly skilled corporate executives into individual entrepreneurship. Many of our leading high technology firms were started by executives who developed considerable knowledge of an industry while employed in a major corporation, then branched out on their own. Now, there is little economic incentive to trade away the high salaries and relative security of such jobs for the uncertainties of self employment.

The drying up of economic incentives to entrepreneurship increasingly magnifies the importance of noneconomic factors motivating people to set up their own businesses. Probably the biggest single noneconomic factor underlying entrepreneurship is the desire "to be my own boss." This aspect of self employment is becoming less significant as various layers of government expand their paper filing requirements on the small businessperson. The entrepreneur may spend many evenings at home poring over forms required by IRS, the state unemployment tax board, and a host of other government entities, none of which are paying customers.

SOLVING THE PROBLEM

There is no panacea to the problem of an eroding entrepreneurial base. The American economy is not subject to an organized conspiracy to snuff out the entrepreneurial spirit. Instead, our enterprise economy faces a "death of a thousand cuts." in which a series of often uncoordinated public policies will further shift the balance of risks and rewards against entrepreneurship.

Despite the problems alluded to in this paper, there is no shortage of Americans willing to take considerable risks in business innovation. Even the casual reader of Fortune or the Wall Street Journal is provided with numerous instances of entrepreneurs who have "made it" despite the most adverse circumstances.

Yet, unless steps are taken soon to slow the deterioration of the climate for American entrepreneurship, our children may face a society in which economic power is concentrated in a few hands and individual opportunity is as severely restricted, as in the European Social Democracies.

It is impractical to formulate the precise details of a national effort to preserve entrepreneurial opportunity. Before restoring the health of our entrepreneurial system it may first be necessary to apply a tourniquet to the patient; i.e. arrest those moves which are further undermining American entrepreneurialism. Then, a number of initiatives can be launched to restore the vitality of the American business system.

There are several distinct objectives to be served by any program to reinvigorate small business. One objective is to maximize competition and technology innovation by fostering the growth of small and medium-sized new technology firms. A quite distinct objective is to maintain a relatively decentralized economy by encouraging the growth of small business of all sorts, even those firms with little potential for technological innovation.

A TRANSFORMATION OF THE SBA

The Small Business Administration (SBA) epitomizes the shortsightedness of public policy makers when looking at a subject such as small business. True to its Congressional mandate, this agancy has functioned as a banker of last resort for small businesses. While only a tiny fraction of American small businesses has received financial assistance from the SBA, nearly 100 percent of those businesses are affected, mostly adversely, by the actions of government taxing and regulatory authorities.

The SBA has seen its role largely as a financing backstop for small businesses. In return Congress has until very recently treated the agency as a sacred cow. The Small Business committees of both the Senate and the House have championed generous funding of the SBA's various financing programs. Meanwhile SBA has earned a strong reputation for particularly accommodating service to favored constituents of key legislators. In addition, SBA has almost always remained silent about effects which social welfare legislation may have on small businss.

This tacit understanding between the Congress and the SBA results in both the absence of any governmental advocate for small business and an excessive politicization of the process for dispensing SBA financing. At a minimum, any national policy to promote entrepreneurship must start with a drastic transformation of the SBA.

A strong case can be made for abolishing the SBA and replacing it with an entrepreneurial advocacy agency staffed largely by persons hired from the private sector. However desirable, such approaches are seldom politically attainable. Instead, it may be realistic to convert the existing CBA from a financing to an advocacy agency.

The Small Business Administration would be given as its prime responsibility the reviewing beforehand of all major legislation being considered by the executive branch for submission to Congress to analyze its potential impact on small businss. In addition, the SBA could also be required to review all other significant proposed actions of executive agencies to assess their impact on small business.

To perform this analytic function, the SBA would need to recruit an economic analysis staff of at least the caliber of that possessed by the Federal Trade Commission. If such a staff had been in existence at the time of the consideration of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration legislation or the ERISA pension bill, it is likely that the resulting legislation would have been far more palatable to small businesses.

Obviously, the impact on small businesses is not the principal consideration in the evaluation of the merits of most legislation and other governmental action. It is a consideration, however, which has been almost totally ignored. In many cases social welfare legislation could have been tailored in a way that would have minimized its often disproportionately adverse impact on small businesses.

As long as the SBA is involved in a very significant way in making loans or providing loan guarantees to individual businesses, the agency is likely to focus more on overseeing its loan portfolio than on addressing the systematic causes of small business distress. The enormous administrative burden in dispensing such financing and the need to cope with resulting political pressures are both likely to distract even the most imaginative SBA Administrator from functioning as an advocate for general small business interests.

Many SBA financing and guarantee functions could readily be spun off to private lenders. Direct loan and loan guarantee programs might be converted to a variety of interest rate subsidy programs to lenders and/or borrowers and automatic partial guarantees. The program could be structured to ensure that the bank making the loan would have to expose itself to some risk of loss. Thus, it would be in the bank's interest to reject patently unsound loan applications. Interest subsidies could vary to promote certain objectives; e.g. loans to depressed inner city areas, to socially or economically disadvantaged business owners, or to assist businesses in adjusting to requirements of Federal environmental law.

EVALUATING THE SUBSIDIES

There are a number of factors to consider in evaluating the utility of any subsidy or guarantee mechanism. Whatever the shape of the optimum incentive system for small business decided on by Congress, there is no inherent necessity for it to be administered by Federal employees. Banks and other private lenders could perform many of the functions now carried out by SBA field employees.

The resultant administrative savings could be applied to fund the greater financing volume which a more open-ended system would be likely to generate. In addition, business applicants could more readily secure a "yes" or "no" answer, thus eliminating a major cause of complaint with existing SBA loan guarantee programs.

While phasing out its direct loan and loan guarantee activity, the SBA could increase the financing available for such vehicles as Small Business Investment Companies, (SBICs), Local Development Companies, (LDCs), and State Development Companies (SDCs). Each of these entities leverages a significant amount of private capital. Furthermore, specific financing decisions are made by private second individuals.

Such organizations as the SBIC, LDC, and the SDC provide flexible instruments for injecting needed equity or debt capital into a variety of small businesses. The SBA's administrative burden is far less in those situations in which the development vehicles described above maintain responsibility for accepting or rejecting a financing application and for servicing the portfolio of existing investments.

VENTURE CAPITAL THROUGH TAX POLICY

In addition to a depoliticization and privatization of the loan programs administered by the SBA, a concerted effort to generate equity capital for small and new business is also vitally important. While greater incentives might be provided to existing entities such as Small Business Investment Companies, an important focus of any incentive system should be on reshaping the Internal Revenue Code to reward the fruits of entrepreneurship. This might be accomplished by immunizing from tax all or a very substantial portion of any capital gain realized by an investor/entrepreneur in a qualified small business.

Outside investors might be strongly encouraged to invest funds in small businesses, if they were permitted to defer tax on any capital gains they realized, provided that they reinvested the proceeds of the sale into a qualifying small business investment. Individuals who are locked into an existing investment by the desire to avoid a steep tax bite would likely find this option attractive.

These or related changes in the Internal Revenue Code would almost certainly produce a significant infusion of equity capital for many modestly capitalized firms with substantial growth potential.[8] The most likely beneficiaries of such changes in the tax law would be new technology companies with a potential to develop or market new or significantly refined products. In many instances, these companies would be providing serious competition in particular product or service markets to currently dominant super corporations. The consumer might reap the harvest of such activity through either an increased diversity or quality of products or services or reduced prices.

TECHNOLOGY COMMERCIALIZATION

Both government and industry have done a relatively poor job over the years exploiting the commercial potential of inventions developed through most Federally funded an even some privately funded research. Numerous factors have accounted for this failure, including:

The reluctance of many large, well capitalized corporations to "spread themselves too thin" by assuming additional product responsibilities;

The difficulties that aggressive, small technology-oriented firms have had in securing capital for expansion;

The poor communications within some large corporations between their research departments and those responsible for bringing a product to market;

The tendency of many inventions developed in Federal laboratories to remain on the shelf because the focus of Federal research scientists centers on the proof of concept rather than product commercialization;

The fairly minimal dissemination of information concerning Federally sponsored inventions with commercial potential.

Several years ago, the U.S. Department of Commerce's Office of Minority Business Enterprise, the National Aeornautics and Space Administration and National Science Foundation launched an imaginative program to enable minority firms to participate in technology commercialization. Major corporations, such as Rockwell International, provided capital for Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Companies (MESBICs), now officially described as Section 301(d) SBICs, and targeted these funds to finance technology commercialization by minority firms. This development of a pool of investment capital was accompanied by a systematic attempt to search out inventions developed in major corporations and in the Federal laboratory consortium. This technology commercialization effort has developed wide support throughout the Federal government and the corporate sector. The results to date have been encouraging.

A technology commercialization program targeted at small business can be patterned to a substantial extent after the pioneer program for minority enterprise. The SBIC legislation might be amended to provide for a technology SBIC that could draw matching capitalization from the SBA on favorable terms. This specifically targeted capitalization could be combined with a much more effective system for searching out and, where appropriate, securing licensing of commercially exploitable technology to small business.

A PRO-COMPETITIVE THREAT

The Ripon Society believes that the proposals outlined in this paper can pump new vitality into our entrepreneurial system. These proposals are pro-competitive in thrust. They seek to encourage the maintenance of a moderately decentralized economy by reducing barriers to entrepreneurial entry and growth rather than by breaking up huge corporations merely because of their size. In addition to the dubious economic justification for such a "break up the big boys" strategy, there is ample indication that the antitrust laws provide a laborious means of curbing the power of corporate oligopolies.

The development of a large, highly educated group of Americans reluctant to work in impersonal, hierarchical structures should provide the human capital for an entrepreneurial resurgence. The initiatives proposed in this paper should help to shift the balance of risks and rewards toward those who have the imagination and stamina to be economic innovators. Perhaps we can look forward to a future in which the builder of a better mousetrap will be rewarded more generously than the bureaucrat who writes regulations on rodent extermination devices.●

HENRY L. ZUCKER

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, good deeds often go unrewarded and unnoticed, and so it is a particular delight when outstanding service and dedication are enthusiastically and publicly honored. An example of such recognition was the recent designation of Henry L. Zucker by the United Way of America as winner of its "Outstanding Agency Professional Award," given for the first time in that organization's history. It culminates a whole series of honors bestowed on Mr. Zucker, executive vice president emeritus of the Jewish Community Federation of Cleveland, for a lifetime of service to his fellow men: Catholic Charities Community Services Award, Case Western Reserve University Distinguished Alumni Award, National United Jewish Appeal Award of Honor, and the Federation for Community Planning Outstanding Service Award.

Almost every aspect of Cleveland's community life has benefited from Mr. Zucker's imagination, drive, and professional skill. He has been an outstanding leader in the affairs of universities, civic organizations, public administration, philanthropic undertaking, and, of course, his own Jewish community. But his influence has been felt nationally and internationally as well, since for most of his career he has been directly concerned not only with local problems but with the situation of Jewish refugees everywhere and the needs of men and women of all faiths who have been bruised by the turmoil of our times.

The award from the United Way describes Mr. Zucker accurately:

Humanitarian, scholar, internationalist, innovator—Henry Zucker has devoted his life to serving his fellow men. Combining spiritual commitment and concern for others with the practical skills of an administrator and practitioner, he has forged a permanent legacy of quality service for his people, his community, his nation, and the world.●

IMPORT RELIEF FOR THE ZINC INDUSTRY

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the Lead-Zinc Producers committee has petitioned the International Trade Commission under section 201 of the Trade Act of 1974 for relief from the flood of zinc imports entering the United States. On March 21, the ITC held hearings on the case. Representatives from two of the major zinc producers—the St. Joe Zinc Co. and the Gulf and Western Natural Resources Group of Pennsylvania (New Jersey Zinc)—presented statements at the hearing which outline in definitive terms the drastic impact excessive zinc imports have had on the domestic industry. I ask that these two important statements be printed in the RECORD.

The statements follow:

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM E. FLAHERTY

My name is William E. Flaherty, and I am Executive Vice President of Gulf and Western Natural Resources Group. I joined The New Jersey Zinc Company as Vice President of Marketing in 1974, became Senior Vice President in 1975 and was named to my present position in 1976 when The New Jersey Zinc Company and other resource companies within Gulf and Western Industries were consolidated into the Natural Resources Group. Prior to joining The New Jersey Zinc Company, I was associated with General Motors Corporation and Reynolds Metals.

Substantial parts of The Natural Resources Group include The New Jersey Zinc Company—the nation's original zinc producer—and Jersey Miniere Zinc Company, which will become the nation's newest zinc producer later this year. New Jersey Zinc operates a zinc smelter in Palmerton, Pa. Jersey Miniere is building a $150-million zinc refinery in Clarksville, Tenn., scheduled to begin production in the fall of this year.

Prior to 1972, New Jersey Zinc also operated a zinc smelter in Depue, Ill. However, a surge of price discounted imports at that time depressed the domestic market and made the plant uneconomic. We were forced to terminate production there and lay off hundreds of workers.

I'm here today because we're faced with the same problem at our Palmerton smelter. Because of a series of seemingly endless price drops brought about by floods of discounted imported zinc, the slab zinc plant is operating at a loss and has been for some time. If do not obtain relief from these price discounted imports, we will be faced with the hard decision of whether to remain in the zinc business at Palmerton.

Although we are part of a large, diversified corporation, we operate under the profit center concept. In other words, each company in our corporation must demonstrate its own ability to pay its costs, maintain its employment, and operate at a reasonable profit. With Gulf-Western, we must also demonstrate an ability to grow and create new jobs.

In our efforts to remain competitive with price-discounted imports, we have lowered our prices four times since the beginning of 1977. In each case, foreign traders were selling imported zinc from one to five cents below our prices. And each time we lowered our prices, they lowered their prices to maintain a difference. Today, you can still buy imported zinc below our prices.

WHY IMPORTERS DISCOUNT PRICES

The main reason importers maintain that spread is that they lack the sales and service organizations we have and they lack the research and technical backup that goes with it. Since they do not offer these services their only advantage becomes price. Many of the import firms here are subsidiaries of foreign producers which have large stocks of metal at home. These agents of foreign producers are under considerable pressure to sell in the U.S., since it is the only market in the world where substantial quantities of imported zinc are sold.

I can appreciate the need for foreign producers to sell this way in the world's only open zinc market since I am a director of Asturienne New Jersey S.A. and chairman of Blancs de Zinc de la Mediterranee, two companies in France. It is not uncommon in Europe to be unable to lay off workers during recessions; or if you do, your social responsibilities require extensive severances and/or other job guarantees.

Under those conditions, it is more economic to maintain high production and try to export the surplus to other countires. Of course, when you do that, you, in effect, export your own unemployment.

That's exactly what is happening in the case of slab zinc coming into this country. Foreign production remains closer to full capacity, foreign workers continue their jobs, but American workers eventually lose theirs.

SLAB ZINC IN CRISIS

In the case of slab zinc in America, the situation has reached crisis proportions. To the best of my knowledge, not a single American producer is making a profit on slab zinc. All are operating at a loss.

In my judgment, if we do not get relief from imports, it will not be a case of one or two more domestic producers going out of business. It will be a case of shutting down the entire United States zinc industry. The United States would then be totally at the mercy of interruptable foreign supply.

And the impact of that dependence goes far beyond the number of workers we employ because zinc is a vital material in so many other industries. For example, you simply cannot make rubber without it. And it makes steel last 20 to 80 times longer.

According to a recent article in The Wall Street Journal, the Commerce Department will report that corrosion now costs the United States $70 billion a year. As large as that figure is, it would be significantly higher without zinc protection. Conversely, the use of more zinc would lower that staggering cost and help conserve America's other resources.

In my testimony today, I'm going to outline the substantial efforts my company has been making to develop new zinc production, to research and develop new products, to modernize and become more competitive, to supply American consumers with research and technical assistance, and to explore for new zinc deposits in this country.

All of these efforts, by the way, require an investment in America—an investment not totally shared by many foreign producers. Our investments will cease if the United States is forced to stop zinc production because of low priced imports.

Our frequently stated policy for the past several years has been to help restore a greater measure of self-sufficiency in zinc, which is the fourth most important primary metal consumed in this country. To that end, we have invested hundreds of millions of dollars in exploring for new deposits, in developing and bringing into production new mines, in building a new refinery—and in significantly modernizing our Palmerton, Pa., smelter.

ZINC PRODUCTION BEGAN IN 1848

Our commitment to zinc and our contributions to technology began in 1848—130 years ago. The New Jersey Zinc Company pioneered the original processes for producing zinc continuously and later for making high purity zinc. These processes were subsequently licensed around the world and they made zinc available as a modern material for many new industrial products.

Our research laboratories, set up shortly after the turn of the century, were some of the first by industrial corporations in America. The list of product and process innovations they created is long. Highlights include the invention of all original commercial die casting alloys. The invention of these alloys set in motion the entire die casting industry world-wide, and meant that complex-shaped products like auto carburetors and appliance parts could be economically made and mass produced for the first time.

We hold hundreds of patents for zinc products for the manufacture of rubber, paper, plastics, paints and other materials. And we continue to develop exciting new materials such as our superplastic zinc—a material which has the formability of plastics yet the strength and durability of metal. Last year, we even developed specialized machinery and opened a demonstration plant to show manufacturers how to use this exciting new material.

Our commitment to research has not let up. Just two months ago, we opened a new, modern, $3.5-million research facility in Bethlehem, Pa. There we continue to develop zinc metal products, such as spring liners for automobiles and trucks. We also have laboratory-size facilities to manufacture rubber, paper, plastic and paints—all of which use zinc as an ingredient.

All of these materials—including steel—would not last nearly as long if they did not contain zinc or were not coated with it. Without zinc, America's other resources would be consumed at much higher rates.

Through Energy Development Associates, a joint venture of Gulf-Western Industries and Hooker Chemical Corporation, we believe we have already developed the most advanced zinc-chloride battery system to date. By 1980, we will have a 10-million watt-hour battery module—enough to service the peak load requirements of a city of 60,000 people—on steam. By the mid-1980's we believe we can produce a battery for an electric car which would be competitive in price with conventional vehicles.

Much of our research is designed specifically to help our zinc consuming customers. Our work with superplastic zinc, for example, is designed to show American manufacturers how to use it—not for us to get into the manufacturing business ourselves. Similarly, our work with die castings is designed to assist the American die caster become more competitive—not for us to get into the die casting business.

To supplement our research, we therefore maintain a full staff of technical specialists who transmit our technology to our customers. It's their job to assist zinc users in solving technical and/or production problems. It's their job to help introduce newer processes, or suggest newer, more competitive products.

COMMITMENTS TO AMERICAN CONSUMERS

A modern materials business in America demands this sort of commitment to the consumer—a commitment to develop new supplies, to develop new and improved products, to assist the consumer in remaining competitive and to help him with his problems.

And in back of these commitments must be the commitment to develop the capital necessary to accomplish all these jobs. You must lay out the capital many years in advance. Much of the money for the first pound of zinc we will produce in Tennessee was spent twenty years ago when we borrowed the oil industry's technique of wildcatting and discovered the large zinc deposits in central Tennessee.

But even with the deposits, we lacked enough capital to build the refinery on our own. Without a partner, we could not have made this very important move. As you may know, the Jersey Miniere Zinc Company is 40% owned by Union Miniere of Belgium. In this case at least, some of the dollars will have come from Europe instead of the other way around.

MARKET SUPPORT COSTS MONEY

I've outlined our activities briefly to try to give you an understanding of our efforts to serve American industry, and very importantly, that this service requires an investment that goes far beyond simply converting zinc concentrates to zinc metal.

When the United States market is disrupted by a continuing flood of excess imports, which drives our prices below the cost of production, our whole chain of exploration, research, market development and customer service grinds towards a halt.

In our efforts to remain competitive, we have cut severely our expenditures for all these support activities, which normally should rise each year just to keep up with inflation. Effective import relief would permit us to resume these expenditures at normal levels.

My own experience working in automotive development with most of the U.S. auto producers has convinced me that materials instability is one of the single most important reasons why one material is substituted for another in the car. When you are designing automobiles three to five years in advance, you must select materials which have demonstrated records of supply stability. In my judgment, the instability of zinc, caused primarily by increasing imports, is one of the contributory factors in zinc's declining use in the automobile.

WHY DEPUE CLOSED

Let me illustrate the problem by returning to 1970. At that time, The New Jersey Zinc Company, in addition to its Palmerton smelter, operated a 70,000 ton a year slab zinc smelter in Depue, Illinois. In 1970, imports of 260,000 tons were 22% of U.S. consumption. In 1971 imports swelled to 324,000 tons, or 26% of domestic consumption.

New Jersey Zinc recognized the impending problem in a marketing study prepared in 1970, from which I quote: "Imports at cut prices have taken a larger share of this (slab zinc) market each year since quotas were removed in 1965. Foreign competition . . . will play a bigger role and and we will probably see some intrusions into the steel galvanizing markets before long. If the traditional foreign discounts on SHG are offered aggressively to the steel companies, it could have an adverse affect on our market."

At those discounts and under that import pressure, Depue became uneconomic to operate and we were forced to terminate production. For the record, at no time did The New Jersey Zinc Company attribute the shutdown, which was completed in early 1972, to impending environmental control regulations. Our people believe they could have addressed that problem as they have successfully done in Palmerton.

The closing of Depue resulted in the loss of about 500 jobs in addition to the loss of 70,000 tons of slab zinc capacity. It resulted in the loss of over 100 customers primarily in the Midwest, who were serviced from the Depue plant. At that time, The New Jersey Zinc Company had already invested some $28 million in the modernization of that plant.

HUMAN SUFFERING

The closing of the Depue plant was felt by its citizens in a variety of ways. Our plant was Depue's single major industry. About 60 percent of the plant's employees had never worked at another job, and the prospect of looking for a new one—even with our company's help—was difficult. Equally unpleasant was the thought of signing up for what the workers called "welfare" at the Employment Security office.

Further, the plant's closing seriously undermined the town's tax base, because of a lack of funds to run the local schools, the town officials were forced to go to the state capital in Springfield to obtain a special grant so they could weather the fiscal crisis.

AFTER DEPUE CLOSED

Now look what happened. In 1972, world demand for zinc began building at an unprecedented rate, reaching 6.0 million short tons for the year, and peaking at 6.6 million short tons in 1973. In the U.S., shortages developed, and prices of imported metal skyrocketed to as high as 88 cents per pound. And, this could happen again without a strong U.S. Zinc industry.

Very importantly, during this shortage period many nations virtually withdrew from the U.S. market, preferring to service other makets at higher prices.

On the consuming level, hard decisions were made to design away from zinc. Materials planners simply could not forecast with sufficient accuracy the price and availability of zinc three to five years ahead.

PALMERTON NOW THREATENED WITH CLOSING

Once again, escalating imports into the U.S. at heavily discounted prices are pressuring our plant operations. Once again we are operating a slab zinc facility at a loss. Once again, we are faced with the hard decision of whether or not to keep our remaining plant operating.

And once again we are losing sales to price discounted foreign metal. Looking at the sales record of thirteen important customers, our sales to them were 57% less in 1977 than in 1976. Salesmen's call reports show that in each instance, the customer bought less from us and more from importers. In two of these cases, our sales were reduced to zero.

Sales to independent alloyers suffered even more. Our records show a loss of 79% of our 1976 sales tonnage to independent alloyers in 1977. And in two cases, we were not even able to sell one ton to them in 1977.

The situation has reached crisis proportions. We cannot long endure putting more money each month into a plant that we recover—even with the financial strength of a large industrial corporation behind us. We cannot long endure taking money from our other companies to keep the zinc plant operating.

NEW INVESTMENTS IN ZINC

And we have not stood idly by. Since the closing of our Depue plant, we have invested heavily in modernizing the Palmerton smelter—some $30 million in the last five years alone—to make it more competitive and more efficient.

And as I pointed out earlier, in addition to the modernization of Palmerton, we have almost completed the first new capacity zinc refinery in the U.S. in 36 years. Last year, National Zinc opened a new refinery, but it was to replace an older one adjacent to it and did not result in new capacity.

Clarksville is representative of most of the newer refineries that have been built throughout the world in that it is an electrolytic plant. In this process, zinc concentrates are dissolved in sulfuric acid, the impurities are removed and the zinc is recovered by electrolysis. It is essentially a chemical process.

Even though Clarksville is the newest and most modern refinery in the world—and therefore should logically operate at the lowest possible operating cost—it cannot possibly operate at a profit at today's prices. Even by assembling the most advanced technology available anywhere in the world, we cannot make the plant economic unless we get relief from excessive imports.

Comparing our Palmerton plant with the Clarksville Plant, our total production costs are very similar. Operating costs at Clarksville are slightly lower, but when the capital construction costs are added in, the two plants nearly balance.

At Palmerton, we're operating one of the most fully integrated and complex plants in the world. We not only produce slab zinc in all its various forms and grades, as well as zinc alloys for die casting, we also produce many varieties of American Process zinc oxide—another of our inventions—and French Process zinc oxide. We also make zinc and other nonferrous metal powders, zinc dust, and operate a rolling mill to produce zinc sheet and strip for such products as flashlight batteries.

By-products produced at Palmerton include sulfuric acid, cadmium and indium. We also maintain an unrelated primary plant at Palmerton for the production of ammonia and liquid carbon dioxide.

SLAB ZINC CAPACITY AT PALMERTON

The Palmerton plant, which has a rated top capacity of 118,000 tons of primary zinc metal 1, is both a producer and a consumer of primary zinc. Of the total, approximately 48,000 tons is consumed internally to manufacture other products such as zinc oxide, zinc dust and rolled zinc, leaving a potential balance of 70,0000 tons of slab zinc for sale to others. During 1977, 50,718 tons of slab zinc were produced for sale, which was 72½% of that potential.

One of the outstanding advantages of Palmerton is that it can produce zinc from many varieties of natural ores or from scrap. Thus it is a plant which helps conserve America's natural resources by recycling.

At Palmerton, 43 vertical retort furnaces convert sintered zinc concentrates and other zinc materials into zinc metal. The furnaces rise five stories high and reach internal temperatures of nearly 2,000 degrees F. Zinc concentrates mixed with coal in pre-heated briquettes are charged at the top. The zinc vaporizes and is condensed into liquid zinc. Metal produced by the vertical retorts is Prime Western grade, but if fed into distillation columns can be further refined to produce the other grades of slab zinc.

EMPLOYMENT DECLINES IN ZINC

At one time, employment at Palmerton reached 5,700 people, but the work force has declined to 1,530 currently. The annual payroll is approximately $25 million, making it the largest employer in Carbon County, Pa. If the plant were to close, it would have disastrous economic effects on the county, which is already economically depressed.

Further, if Palmerton were to close, we might have to shut down numerous support activities. These include the Bethlehem, Pa., administration offices, employing approximately 240 people; the Bethlehem, Pa., research center, employing another 77 people, and the Friedensville, Pa., mine, with 196 on the payroll.

In addition, our other mines throughout the country which supply Palmerton might also close. They include Austinville, Va., with 286 miners; Sterling, N.J., with 182, and two mines in Tennessee with another 242 people.

LOW CAPACITY RAISES UNIT COSTS

At this time, I'd also like to emphasize the effects of operating below capacity. When we shut down one of our furnaces, we must keep it hot or else the heat resistant linings will crack and fall apart. Rebuilding these special, highly expensive linings requires many months of work and hundreds of thousands of dollars per unit. The fuel for keeping a furnace hot, even though it is not producing metal, is approximately 48% of the fuel required to operate it at full capacity. It should be readily apparent that the per pound cost of zinc rises drastically at lower capacity levels.

Thus, when we operate at around 70% of capacity or less and must compete with plants in other nations operating at much higher levels, it puts us at a severe disadvantage.

WHY WE'RE BUILDING A NEW REFINERY

Let me turn now to our new refinery in Clarksville, Tenn. After the loss of Depue, my company made extreme efforts to rebuild, and hopefully enlarge, our capacity. We had discovered sufficient ore in the United States to supply a major refinery and believed, especially during the shortage years of 1973–74, that something had to be done to rebuild United States capacity so that American industry would not be caught again with shortages.

Like many in American industry, particularly those in the metals business, we had the dream—but not the cash. And we found it extremely difficult to borrow money, given the traditionally low rates of return that characterize the metals industry. Bankers found higher return industries, such as consumer products, much more appealing.

In any event, we quickly found that we could not proceed with a major project of this type on our own. And as I pointed out earlier, even though we're part of a larger industrial company, each part is required to stand on its own feet financially. That set off a long search to find a partner with enough cash and enough courage to invest in the zinc business in the United States.

Let me tell you, it wasn't easy. However, we finally got together with Union Miniere of Belgium. Union Miniere had developed sufficient capital for new investment and was looking for new projects. The United States seemed an attractive area for investment.

In our negotiations with them, we also grew to appreciate more the intrinsic higher value that Europeans place on basic resources—particularly for the long run. We found a general European attitude that resources were more important than service industries.

Thus, in July, 1975, we entered into an agreement with Union Miniere for the joint ownership and operation of a mine we were developing at Elmwood, Tenn.; the development initially of two other mines adjacent to Elmwood; and the construction near Clarksville, Tenn., of a new electrolytic zinc refinery complex designed to initially produce 90,000 tons annually of slab zinc. Under the agreement, we sold to Union Miniere a 40% interest in a joint venture which holds the Elmwood mine, certain additional properties in various stages of development and the refinery technology.

LARGE PRIVATE INVESTMENT IN TENNESSEE

The total cost of the mine development and refinery will exceed $210 million, making it one of the largest private projects ever undertaken in Tennessee. Mining and refinery capital costs are being financed from cash flow from the Elmwood Mine, equipment leasing, payments received by NJZ from Union and cash contributions by the partners. Originally scheduled for completion in mid-1979, it is now scheduled for fall 1978 opening.

When Clarksville comes on-stream, it will add 14% to U.S. primary refining capacity and give the U.S. a total of 730,000 tons.

However, if the industry does not get effective relief from imports, it will be impossible to operate that plant at a profit. As you recall, its total production costs are very similar to those of Palmerton. Thus, without effective relief, the plant will be threatened.

We anticipate the plant will employ from 500 to 600 people, plus an additional several hundred for its supporting mines and offices. In the construction phase we have also provided employment for as much as 1200 to 1600 workers. While we are happy to provide those jobs, we can only pray that those jobs can remain, and even be increased. But the future depends on the outcome of this case.

MARKETING PREPARATIONS FOR CLARKSVILLE

Earlier I outlined many of our total efforts in exploration, mine development, research and product development, and in marketing—all of which are interdependent on each other.

In bringing a project on-stream of the magnitude of Clarksville, we have not ignored the necessary market preparation. You cannot throw the switch on a plant that size and wait for the telephone to ring for your first order. If you do that, you might as well not build the plant at all.

Thus it was necessary for us to begin the slow process of building sales almost two years ago. We began by enlarging our sales and marketing departments, opening new offices, increasing our customer service, expanding our advertising and promotion, and particularly rebuilding supplier relations with the customers we lost when we were forced to close Depue.

We are also using small amounts of imported metal to service some of the customers. For the past two years, these have amounted to only some 1 percent to 2 percent of imports, and are nowhere near the capacity of our new refinery. This means we still have an enormous job in making an orderly transition of U.S. produced metal for foreign. This is a temporary situation, designed solely to pre-build a market for Clarksville.

ALLOY AND DIE CASTING MARKETS

I would also like to review our position in the alloy and die casting markets. As I pointed out earlier, the New Jersey Zinc Company invented the current commercial alloys which most people designate Zamak. Zamak was our trade name, which we allowed to become generic, and the bulk of all alloy used in the U.S. today is Zamak 3, Zamak 5 and Zamak 7. These alloys are made by adding small amounts of aluminum, magnesium and copper to special high grade zinc. We sell special high grade zinc to independent alloyers so they can make the products we invented. Most of them, in fact, call their product Zamak. We also sell alloy to zince die casters.

Our company has no restrictions on the amount of special high grade zinc an independent alloyer may purchase from us. All of the primary production from Clarksville will be special high grade zinc, some of which will be converted to other grades. And we can easily increase our production of special high grade zinc at Palmerton.

HOW WE WILL USE THE PROPOSED RELIEF

How will favorable action by this Commission and the President affect us, and how can we use this temporary relief to help rebuild the U.S. zinc industry?

I can only say that without relief—substantial and soon—there may not be a zinc industry in the United States. I reiterate, we cannot long survive operating at a loss.

If you rule favorably and the President grants effective import relief, we plan to continue our substantial research and marketing efforts. At stake are new automotive products which we are designing, the whole breakthrough in superplastic metals, the new anti-corrosion systems for such products as your automobile, the new zinc-based batteries and countless other products based on zinc. For the coming year, we are not projecting growth over 1977. However, these new products will demand more zinc in the coming years if Americans are to benefit from them.

And I hope you agree that our investments in zinc have been very substantial. I can't promise you that we'll build another new refinery next year, but I can promise you that we will increase our efforts to find more zinc, to increase our already substantial research and development efforts, to attempt to provide customers with reasonable assurances of a stable domestic zinc market for their planning purposes, so that it once again becomes healthy enough to consider more new plants, and to provide more jobs.

Gentlemen, the United States became a great nation because we developed our basic resources more fully and completely than anywhere else in the world. If we are to continue to provide the basic material which is vital for so many of our industry products, we should not be reduced to ever-increasing dependence on foreign sources.

I believe the type of relief we are asking for is the fairest and most equitable under the law. My plea to you is not only for a report which favors our petition, but that it be done as rapidly as possible.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES L. BROADHEAD

I. INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

My name is James L. Broadhead. I am President of St. Joe Zinc Company and Vice President of its parent, St. Joe Minerals Corporation. I hold a Bachelor of Mechanical Engineering degree from Cornell University and LL.B. from Columbia Law School. Before joining St. Joe in 1968, I worked as an engineer for Ingersoll-Rand Company and was associated with the New York City law firm of Debevoise, Plimpton, Lyons & Gates.

Prior to assuming my present position as President of St. Joe Zinc in May 1977, I held a variety of positions with the St. Joe organization, including Secretary, General Counsel and Vice President-Development of St. Joe Minerals, Vice President of its subsidiary, St. Joe Petroleum, and Chairman of its subsidiary, Energy Research Corporation.

As the name implies, St. Joe Zinc Company operates St. Joe's zinc business, which consists essentially of a mine complex in St. Lawrence County, New York, a zinc smelter in Monaca, Pennsylvania, and a headquarters group, including sales and marketing, in Pittsburgh.

Mr. Nehmer's statement summarizes the devastating impact that increasing imports of slab zinc have had on the domestic slab zinc industry generally. Since 1975 the escalating level of slab zinc imports has caused reduced shipments, production cutbacks and layoffs, severely depressed prices and substantial operating losses for the firms in the industry. It is quite clear that if nothing is done to reduce the flood of imports, some American producers will be forced to go out of the zinc business.

1. The specific adverse impact of increased

Rather than reiterate the very telling statistics you have already heard, my testimony today will focus on three major areas: imports on St. Joe—this country's largest producer of slab zinc;

1. The extensive efforts and expenditures made by our company to compete effectively; and

3. The bleak outlook for St. Joe Zinc if effective relief from increasing slab zinc imports is not provided.

II. ST. JOE ZINC OPERATIONS

First, let me briefly describe St. Joe Minerals Corporation and the operations of St. Joe Zinc Company. St. Joe Minerals is a growing natural resource company with significant interests in coal, oil and gas, lead, and zinc. The Company's net sales in 1977 totaled over $790 million. St. Joe Zinc Company was formed in 1977 to facilitate the operation of St. Joe's zinc business on a profit center basis. Under that concept the Zinc Company is required to demonstrate its ability to earn a reasonable profit and to pay for further capitol additions.

The smelter

St. Joe entered the zinc business in 1926 with the purchase of mines in upper New York state. That acquisition spurred St. Joe research in basic zinc metallurgy, which led to the development of the electrothermic zinc smelting process. A St. Joe smelter incorporating this process was developed at Monaca, Pennsylvania. This plant is now one of the world's largest zinc smelters, having a capacity of 250,000 tons per year of zinc equivalent, including 220,000 tons of zinc metal.

The heart of the electrothermic process at the Monaca facility is 17 resistance-type electric shaft furnaces. The usual furnace is 50 feet high with an inside diameter of 8 feet and has electrodes near the top and bottom. Coke and zinc-bearing materials are fed into the top of the furnace, and the flow of current through the charge develops the temperature required to vaporize the zinc. To produce zinc metal, the furnace offgases bubble through a large "U"-tube filled with molten zinc, which condenses the gas to liquid zinc that is then cast into slabs or alloyed further to meet specific customer needs. Some of the metal is further processed to produce various grades of French process zinc oxide or zinc dust. To produce American process zinc oxide, the furnace vapors are burned in a combustion chamber with air, and the resultant powders are collected. A 110,000 kilowatt coal-burning power plant, constructed by St. Joe in 1957, supplies the bulk of the smelter's power requirements.

Advantages of smelter

Our smelter has several distinct advantages. While it is more labor-intensive than modern electrolytic units, its flexible circuitry permits St. Joe to use zinc concentrates from up to a dozen different sources, to recycle our own plant process residues and, perhaps most importantly, to recycle our customers' zinc-bearing galvanizing residues. We are by far the country's largest consumer of such secondary materials. As you know, recycling conserves energy and preserves natural resources. For example, the energy requirement for recycled zinc production is less than 40% of the energy required to produce zinc from ore.

This smelting process flexibility also permits St. Joe to produce a variety of zinc grades, tailor-made alloys, both American and French process zinc oxide, and zinc dust. We sell to our customers more than 25 grades of zinc metal, 22 grades of zinc oxide, and 6 grades of zinc dust.

The electrothermic process also produces a higher quality American process zinc oxide than any other method. Our customers can use St. Joe American process oxide in applications where higher priced French process oxide would ordinarily be specified.

Our smelter is located in America's industrial heartland, 30 miles northwest of Pittsburgh on the Ohio River. Rail, highway and barge facilities handle our raw materials as well as our products and by-products. This location enables us to ship zinc on very short notice to many of our customers located in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia. Our regional warehouses in Chattanooga, Houston and St. Louis afford similar capability in those regions. This allows our customers to minimize their inventories of slab zinc.

III. IMPACT OF INCREASING SLAB ZINC IMPORTS ON ST. JOE

The extraordinarily high level of imports of slab zinc during the past several years has had a devastating impact on St. Joe.

Shipments

During the years 1970 through 1974, we were able to ship all of our own production plus substantial amounts of GSA stockpile slab zinc, and our shipments of slab zinc averaged more than 214,000 tons per year. For the years 1975 through 1977, our slab zinc shipments averaged only 125,000 tons—less than 60 percent of the 1970 to 1974 average. This steep decline took place despite a larger St. Joe sales force and increased expenditures for advertising and customer-related services. Furthermore, St. Joe shipments have suffered this serious erosion notwithstanding that United States annual slab zinc consumption is nearly twice the production capability of the entire domestic slab zinc industry.

There is no doubt that the primary reason for our decreased sales has been the pressure from the escalating level of slab zinc imports. For example, although the average slab zinc consumption declined approximately 20 percent from 1970–74 to 1975–77, St. Joe's shipment level declined more than 40 percent during this period. The fact is that in recent years, slab zinc imports have taken a larger and larger share of the generally reduced U.S. slab zinc market, causing domestic producers such as St. Joe to suffer substantial sales losses. In fact, our sales call records reflect numerous specific instances of St. Joe sales lost to foreign imported slab zinc. Let me give you some examples:

1. One of the largest galvanizers in the country, which until recently was an almost 100 percent St. Joe account, reduced its 1977 slab zinc purchases from St. Joe by more than 40 percent from past levels. The reason for this 1977 reduction, according to the company's President, was the decision to purchase low-priced slab zinc from a foreign source.

2. One of our large customers, a steel company, has for the past two years purchased 50 percent less from St. Joe than usual levels. We have firsthand reports that during this period they have purchased thousands of tons of foreign slab zinc.

3. A large brass customer has cut back its purchases from St. Joe by almost 60% in the past two years. Our truckers have frequently reported seeing large quantities of foreign zinc in their plants.

4. A major after-fabrication galvanizer we have served for many years reduced its 1977 slab zinc purchases by 80% from usual levels. Our salesman handling that account was informed by the customer's purchasing agent that these reductions were caused by their increased purchases of foreign slab zinc.

Reduced capacity

Because we have been unable to ship our historical share of slab zinc, we have been forced to operate our smelter at significantly less than capacity. For the last three years, our operating rate has averaged less than 70% of capacity, compared to an average rate of almost 92% in the period from 1970 to 1974. For the past nine months, we have been operating at 65% or less.

Inventories

Despite these very low operating levels, our inventory of finished slab zinc climbed to more than three month's production by the end of 1977. This is three times the one month's inventory that we consider reasonable and normal.

Prices

Perhaps the most damaging financial impact of excessive imports has been the precipitous decline in prices over the past two years. Our price for a pound of Prime Western zinc has dropped from 39c in January 1976 to its present level of 29c. This is our lowest price since December 1973.

Effect on profits

At the same time that our shipments and prices have been declining, costs of electric power, coke, coal, salaries, and wages have all steadily increased. Since December 1973 costs of coke, coal and electric power have increased more than 250%, and salary and wage rates have increased by more than 50%. The result has been a sharp decline in our profits. In 1976 the operations of what is now called St. Joe Zinc Company resulted in a small profit. In 1977 the Zinc Company incurred a loss, and for the first two months of 1978, the rate of loss has been even more substantial. In all cases, the results of slab zinc operations have been less favorable than the results of the Zinc Company as a whole.

Loss of jobs

Perhaps the most distressing—and potentially damaging—consequence of excessive imports is the cost in human terms. Since August 1977, our hourly and salaried operating work force of approximately 2,400 has been reduced by almost 300 persons. Earlier this month we were forced to cut 200 of the 1,700 people at our Monaca smelter. Included in this group were technicians, laborers and engineers in their first jobs, and many employees having more than 30 years of service. Their opportunity to be productive workers in their industry was taken away by foreign slab zinc imports. The objective of this reduction was to maintain the St. Joe Zinc Company on as economical a basis as possible in order to help ensure the continued employment of the remaining employees. Should St. Joe Zinc Company terminate operations, more than 2,100 men and women will become unemployed in areas of the country where unemployment is already high. More than 600 of those people have been employed by St. Joe for longer than 20 years.

IV. EFFORTS TO COMPETE

The present difficulties are particularly frustrating to us, because throughout this recent five-year period, St. Joe has spent substantial sums of money and devoted much time and effort to maintaining and improving the smelter, developing new processes and products, serving our customers and, in general, strengthening our competitive position.

Smelter improvements

Efforts to improve and maintain the smelter have gone forward in three areas: installation of new, improved production equipment; maintenance of existing equipment; and addition of pollution control equipment to meet EPA and Pennsylvania regulations. To carry out these activities, the smelter has maintained a design engineering staff of more than 40 people and, at various times, has retained the services of at least half dozen major engineering firms. Our total expenditures in these areas over the past five years have exceeded $106 million, of which less than 25% is attributable to pollution control.

Some examples of the types of St. Joe projects undertaken to improve the competitive position of the smelter include: a $3½ million program to expand and improve furnace capabilities; the construction of a $2½ million facility to make pigment grades of zinc dust; and the construction of a $3½ million recycling facility for zinc-bearing materials. Projects currently underway include: construction of a so-called "Super Furnace" incorporating many anticipated improvements in design and materials; modification of dust and gas handling facilities to provide greater flexibility in the Roaster and Acid Plants; and steps to improve in-plant material handling capabilities.

Process research

Many of our smelter improvements grew out of the activities of the St. Joe process research department. During the past several years the world zinc industry has been faced with lower quality ores and higher manpower and energy costs. In an attempt to counter these negative factors, our process research group has expended $8½ million to improve our production facilities through metallurgical and process control modifications and to identify and develop attractive alternatives to existing smelting processes. Specific programs include: extensive tests to quantify the variables affecting furnace efficiency; the design of tools and other equipment to minimize maintenance time and increase furnace operating time; the development of instrumented sensor systems to monitor performance; and extensive programs to produce high purity sulfuric acid, to recover more cadmium, and to recover by-product ferrosilicon in furnace residues.

We have also carried out considerable work in recent years to develop improved zinc recycling processes. This is particularly important since, as I stated previously, an advantage of the St. Joe electrothermic process is its capability for recycling zinc-bearing secondary materials. In recent years, we have gone to great efforts to make our costs competitive with secondary smelters, which traditionally have not provided comparable workplace environments or wage-fringe benefits to their workers.

Process research is difficult, time consuming, and expensive. It is our philosophy at St. Joe, however, that steady progress over several years is the only way to improve efficiency and remain competitive.

Since 1975 the process research group has also been actively investigating possibilities for developing a low-energy zinc extraction process. The first step in that investigation was a thorough review of all known zinc producing processes and concepts. We reached the conclusion that the flash reduction of zinc calcines showed the greatest potential for savings in energy and labor. We have entered into an agreement with another company to jointly develop such a process, and preliminary tests have been encouraging. Further development, however, will require construction of a large pilot-plant, which is estimated to cost $10–$12 million, including associated development expenses. Construction of a commercial plant would, of course, cost considerably more.

Product research and market development

St. Joe has also been active in the field of product research and market development. During the past five years we have spent almost $5½ million in an intensive program to improve existing zinc products, to find new markets for these products, to create new products for zinc metal, and to develop markets for those new products.

Our wrought alloy program, for example, has emphasized research, development, and commercialization or super-plastic zinc—a material with unique properties that allow zinc to complete in specific applications with aluminum, steel and plastics. The program included alloy development (which resulted in a patent issued to St. Joe), development of sheet fabrication processes (which culminated in pilot and semi-commercial sheet manufacturing programs), and the development of metal thermoforming equipment and techniques. In 1976 St. Joe formed a wholly-owned subsidiary, Formet Technology Corporation, to manufacture and sell superplastic zinc components. We view superplastic zinc as a potential major new product line for the industry in the years ahead, and we have made a large commitment to underwriting this development.

Our zinc oxide programs, which are aimed at finding major new uses in batteries, complement the activities of Energy Research Corporation, a subsidiary engaged in electrochemical research and development. Energy Research has developed and sold in commercial quantities a silver-zinc battery for high energy density military applications, and has developed prototype nickel-zinc batteries for a variety of applications, including automotive vehicles. We believe Energy Research to be a leader in this prospectively large field, and St. Joe has spent or guaranteed $3½ million since 1973 for its acquisition and support. Energy Research is currently cost-sharing a contract with the U.S. Department of Energy for the development of a nickel-zinc battery for automobile propulsion.

St. Joe sales and marketing activity

St. Joe has been a reliable supplier of zinc for more than 40 years, through periods of shortage and excess supply, and we enjoy a high reputation for integrity and dependability. Nevertheless, we have intensified our sales and marketing efforts in recent years in response to increasing imports.

Because we ship more than 85% of our zinc metal to the galvanizing industry, we custom alloy zinc for specific galvanizing customers, and we continually update our specifications as requests for alloy changes are received.

St. Joe Zinc offers to purchase galvanizing residues from all of its zinc metal customers. Since all galvanizing operations produce residue, the ability to sell the residue to St. Joe on a regular basis is of great value to the customer, who is unable to get this service from most other zinc producers. Furthermore, in order to maintain good customer relationships, we have, over the past two years, purchased residue materials greater than our ability to recycle them.

Recently, to compete with imported zinc, we have also initiated consignment shipping of zinc to major customers to minimize their inventory costs while assuring them adequate zinc on-hand to meet unforeseen short-term increases in consumption.

St. Joe is the industry leader in technical service and technical development for galvanizing. Since its creation in 1964, our Technical Service organization has performed nearly 500 major technical investigations on hot dip galvanizing and more than 1,000 less involved production investigations for specific St. Joe customers. These investigations have saved our customers many thousands of dollars in processing costs. In 1971 we initiated an annual educational program for our galvanizing customers, which detailed the galvanizing process from surface preparation through finished product. Since then, almost 400 people have attended our Annual Galvanizing Seminars, and we have incorporated the presentations into a Galvanizing Manual, which is the educational standard in the industry. In addition, St. Joe has an extensive product advertising program to promote galvanizing and diecasting and to publish technical brochures to assist consumers in utilizing these materials.

Our most recent effort is the creation of a marketing department within St. Joe Zinc. Because the use of zinc in galvanizing has grown by less than 1% per year for the past ten years, St. Joe commissioned a consulting firm to conduct a survey of designers, architects, and governmental officials to determine their knowledge and attitudes regarding zinc coatings and, in particular, galvanized steel. The results indicated that more detailed product and performance cost information would be needed to encourage specifiers to choose zinc coating systems. We, therefore, instituted a program to document successful case histories for galvanized steel and to prepare economic analyses comparing zinc and other coatings on a cost effectiveness basis. We believe that this marketing effort will increase the demand for zinc coated products, thereby increasing the demand for zinc. To the best of our knowledge, St. Joe is the only zinc company performing this type of service.

V. NEED FOR EFFECTIVE IMPORT RELIEF

What is the outlook for St. Joe in the absence of effective import relief? At least once a year St. Joe prepares a formal forecast of zinc consumption and of St. Joe sales. This is prepared on the basis of information supplied by confidential nonferrous forecasting services and specific market information developed by our sales and marketing departments. Until recently we were able to forecast St. Joe zinc sales with a reasonable degree of accuracy by multiplying estimated U.S. consumption in each market segment by the historical percentage of St. Joe shipments to that segment. For the past two years, this method failed because of the grossly excessive amount of slab zinc imports. For 1978, therefore, we have reduced our sales forecast by more than 30,000 tons from what it would have been under our historical forecast because we anticipate continuing losses to foreign imports. Even at current depressed prices, this amounts to a revenue loss of approximately $20 million. For the first two months of 1978, our reduced forecast of St. Joe zinc shipments has been ominously accurate.

On top of that, St. Joe expects continuing low prices and higher unit costs because of lower operating rates. When our budget was prepared last fall, we conservatively estimated an average Prime Western slab zinc price for the year of 31c. As a consequence of that low price, we projected a substantial operating loss. Actually, we will have suffered that projected annual loss by the end of the first quarter of 1978!

Under these conditions, was it reasonable for St. Joe to have spent, over the past five years, on zinc smelter improvements and maintenance, product research, process research, market development, and technical customer service a total of nearly $125 million? We must also ask, is it reasonable for St. Joe to continue such expenditures when its zinc operations are currently unprofitable and when excessively low prices and reduced market share offer little prospect for future profitability? Frankly, this last question has already been answered. We cannot continue our traditional level of expenditures under these conditions. After the most recent price decline, St. Joe Zinc took steps to drop to an absolute minimum its capital expenditures and to reduce its expenditures in product research, process research, and market development, and to make substantial reductions in its salaried and hourly operating staff.

If we do not obtain effective relief against the flood of low-priced slab zinc imports, St. Joe will soon be faced with the question of whether we can continue in the zinc business at all. St. Joe has been the largest zinc producer in the United States for many years, and if we terminate operations, the impact will be substantial. United States slab zinc production capacity will decline by approximately one-third, and an organization that paid local, state, and federal taxes in excess of $42 million over the past five years will cease to exist. What is worse, more than 2,100 employees, with a total annual payroll-fringe package exceeding $50 million, will be out of work in areas where unemployment is already high.

Favorable action by the Commission and the President will create the environment for improved profitability that is essential to justify substantial additional expenditures. St. Joe Zinc wants to return to its traditional policy of funding meaningful research, marketing and exploration efforts, and of spending substantial sums for capital improvements. Among other things, effective import relief could encourage St. Joe to intensify its efforts to develop a new low-energy zinc smelting process.

VI. SUMMARY

In closing, let me summarize my testimony.

First, the impact of increasing low-priced imports of slab zinc has been devastating on St. Joe. We have lost substantial sales and have been compelled to reduce drastically our prices and to operate at 65% or less of our capacity As a consequence, we are incurring substantial losses and have been forced to lay off employees and to reduce both capital expenditures and current expenditures for zinc research and market development.

Second, St. Joe has not been resting on its laurels, but has made substantial efforts to compete effectively. In the last five years we have spent nearly $125 million to maintain and improve our zinc smelter, develop new zinc processes and products, create new zinc markets, and service our customers.

Third, increasing slab zinc imports have caused us to reduce our expenditures in these areas and to re-examine our future in the zinc buisness. If we do not obtain effective relief against excessive imports, we may be forced to go out of the zinc business altogether. Favorable action by the Commission is needed if St. Joe is to spend the substantial sums needed to find more zinc, create new products and new markets, and develop the low-energy extraction process our society sorely needs.

This country knows from our experience with petroleum the perils of relying on foreign sources for raw materials essential to industry, consumers and national security. We are now in danger of becoming almost entirely dependent on foreign sources for our supplies of zinc. It is in the interest of our nation not to let that happen.●

RESOLUTIONS OF GEORGIA STATE SENATE

● Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the Georgia State Senate, in session last month in Atlanta, adopted three resolutions which, for myself and my colleague, Senator Nunn, I bring to the attention of the Senate, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

A RESOLUTION

Urging the Congress to appropriate certain funds in support of the Southeastern Cooperative Wildlife Disease Study; and for other purposes.

Whereas, an increasing need for vital information related to numerous native and foreign diseases transmissible between domestic livestock, poultry, and wildlife has been recognized and documented by way of resolutions adopted by the National Association of State Departments of Agriculture (1973), the U.S. Animal Health Association (1974), the Southern Animal Health Association (1974), the Southeastern Association of Game and Fish Commissioners (1973, 1974), and the International Association of Game, Fish and Conservation Commissioners (1973, 1975); and

Whereas, the Southeastern Cooperative Wildlife Disease Study at the University of Georgia's College of Veterinary Medicine, as conceived and established by the Southeastern Association of Game and Fish Commissioners in 1957, has exhibited extraordinary abilities in solving wildlife disease-related problems of national scope through a regional approach to overall enhancement of public health, national livestock and poultry interests, and this continent's wildlife resources; and

Whereas, a critical need exists for a multi-agency approach to minimize the potentials of disease-related national disasters through merging the resources of the United States Department of Agriculture with State Wildlife Agencies throughout the country to gain insight into disease relationships between domestic and wild animals; and

Whereas, on three occasions the Southeastern Cooperative Wildlife Disease Study has been commended by way of resolutions adopted by the Georgia House of Representatives for its wisdom, ingenuity, and effectiveness in establishing a new concept for betterment of public health interests, this nation's domestic livestock economy, and our irreplaceable wildlife resources.

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Senate that this body hereby urges the Congress of the United States to support a minimum line item appropriation of $500,000 annually to the budget of the U.S. Department of Agriculture to augment the vital functions of the Southeastern Cooperative Wildlife Disease Study at the University of Georgia.

Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to transmit appropriate copies of this Resolution to the Honorable Herman E. Talmadge, United States Senate, Washington, D.C. and Dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine of the University of Georgia.

A RESOLUTION

Relative to the fuel economy standards for 1980–81 light trucks, vans and utility vehicles as proposed by the National Highway Traffic Safety Association (N.H.T.S.A.); and for other purposes.

Whereas, the National Highway Traffic Safety Association (N.H.T.S.A.) has proposed fuel economy standards for model year 1980–81 light trucks below 8,500 pounds (Gross Vehicle Weight Rating); and

Whereas, testimony given at public hearings on these proposed standards indicates that the standards are not now technologically feasible or economically practical; and

Whereas, manufacturers forecast, and the Department of Transportation acknowledges, the possibility that the proposed standards may result in vehicles having (1) less utility, (2) lower performance, (3) higher purchase costs, and (4) restricted availability of some vehicles; and

Whereas, commercial users such as farmers, the construction industry and many other businesses requiring light duty delivery trucks would be adversely affected if these fuel economy standards were adopted; and

Whereas, these proposed standards will apply to all light duty vehicles including public utility trucks, rescue vehicles, delivery vans, many types of farm vehicles, pickup trucks, four-wheel drive vehicles and most types of vans; and such standards could cause severe problems for a large segment of the business community; and

Whereas, these proposed standards could work a hardship on the consuming public as well as have a serious economic impact on the national economy, including the possibility of an increase in the rate of unemployment.

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Senate that this body does hereby oppose the National Highway Traffic Safety Association's (N.H.T.S.A.) proposed fuel economy standards for model year 1980–81 light trucks, vans and utility vehicles and recommends that further study be undertaken prior to establishing fuel economy standards for such vehicles.

Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to transmit appropriate copies of this Resolution to the Honorable Brock Adams, Secretary United States Department of Transportation, and to each member of the Georgia Congressional Delegation.

A RESOLUTION

Urging the Board of Trustees of the Employees' Retirement System of Georgia to file a notice with the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare to withdraw State employees from the Social Security Act; and for other purposes.

Whereas, the social security system was created in 1935 to those persons who could not or would not provide for their own old-age security; and

Whereas, the social security system was created only to supplement other forms of security or pensions; and

Whereas, all Federal employees, plus many State, local and municipal employees across the nation, are not participants in the social security system; and

Whereas, many more State, local and municipal employees have filed notice of their intent to withdraw from participation in the social security program; and

Whereas, Georgia State employees are covered by a financially sound retirement system with very good disability coverage and excellent benefits.

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the Senate that the Board of Trustees of the Employees' Retirement System of Georgia is urged to file a notice in writing with the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare to terminate in its entirety the agreement with the Secretary whereby the employees of the State of Georgia are covered by the Social Security Act and the Federal Insurance Contributions Act. This notice shall be filed on or before March 31, 1978, so that the termination may become effective on March 31, 1980, which is the last day of the first calendar quarter of that year. It is understood that this notice may be withdrawn at any time within this two-year period, but only with the approval of the General Assembly of Georgia.

Be it further resolved that the Board of Trustees of the Employees' Retirement System of Georgia is also encouraged to conduct the necessary studies and report to the 1979 Session of the General Assembly of Georgia on the supplemental retirement and survivor benefits as well as medical and disability benefits that could be provided to all State employees if the payments now being made to the Social Security Administration by the State and the individual employees were made instead to the Employees' Retirement System.

Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate is hereby instructed to transmit an appropriate copy of this Resolution to the Director of the Employees' Retirement System and to each member of the Georgia Congressional Delegation.●

FCC SIGNAL CARRIAGE RULES

● Mr. BIDEN. Mr President, I feel compelled to bring to the attention of my colleagues a situation prevalent throughout the United States, but which has a particularly severe, adverse effect on many of my constituents in Delaware. That is the illogical hold that the Federal Communications Commission has over signal carriage and its disregard of public need.

My own State is small and predominantly rural, but the people there understand that in order to be an informed, educated public they need adequate coverage of news and local events. It is due to this knowledge that they are frustrated with the FCC's disregard for their need to exchange ideas and perspectives as demonstrated by the Commission's signal carriage rules. Those rules explicitly protect local broadcast stations from competitive cable signals. In protecting broadcasters, the Commission states they do so for the public good. The key here is that the Commission assumes without any evidence that cable has an adverse impact on broadcasters. I challenge the Commission to show where cable has ever had an adverse impact on broadcasters anywhere in this country.

In my own State, a group of over 4,000 citizens have filed a petition, the State General Assembly has passed a resolution, and I have made inquiries to the FCC for a common goal—to end the discrimination against rural Americans and deregulate cable carriage except where harm can be indicated.

The Delaware situation is a perfect example of regulatory irrelevance to what the public actually wants.

I ask that the following be printed in the RECORD:

The joint resolution passed unanimously by the 129th General Assembly of the State of Delaware, my correspondence to the FCC in regard to the Delaware situation, their response, and the March 22 Washington Post article by Larry Kramer addressing Delaware's situation in regard to cable television rules.

The material follows:

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 30

Whereas, the State of Delaware has no commercial television channel allocated to it by the Federal Communications Commission and large portions of lower Delaware are unable to receive the signal of the State's education television station (Channel 12), and

Whereas, lower Delaware CATV Inc., operates cable television in eight communities and unincorporated areas in Sussex County to offer increased viewing opportunities for subscribers; and

Whereas, lower Delaware CATV Inc., operating under restrictions imposed by the Federal Communications Commission, is only able to offer its subscribers access to channels in Salisbury, Md., Baltimore, Md., and Washington, D.C.; and

Whereas, these restrictions severely limit the opportunity of some 2,000 subscribers to view news and public service programs concerning the State of Delaware; and

Whereas, the commercial stations in Philadelphia are under FCC order to provide Delaware coverage of news and public affairs; and

Whereas, the FCC restrictions are allegedly designed to protect local commercial television stations from unfair competition by CATV companies; and

Whereas, these restrictions operate to grant WBOC–TV (Salisbury, Md.) a virtual monopoly over what residents of lower Delaware are able to see on cable television; and

Whereas, Delaware is presently prohibited from having a commercial television station by FCC regulations.

Now, therefore:

Be it resolved by the members of the 129th General Assembly of the State of Delaware, the Governor concurring therein, that FCC is urged to grant a waiver of its 1972 Order to allow Lower Delaware CATV Inc. to pick up signals from Philadelphia commercial television stations.

Be it further resolved that members of the Delaware Congressional delegation are urged to continue their efforts to resolve this serious problem.

Be it further resolved that copies of this Senate Joint Resolution be sent to Charles D. Ferris, Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, and to members of the Delaware Congressional Delegation.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 12, 1978.

Mr. WALLACE JOHNSON,
Chief, Broadcast Bureau, Federal Communications Commission, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. JOHNSON: I am writing in reference to a problem which constantly is raised when I speak with constituents in the southern portion of my state—limited television viewer access of Delaware news.

As you know, there is no commercial television station in Delaware. If there were, the problem of coverage of Delaware news would be resolved. As it stands today, Delaware news must be conveyed either by Philadelphia or Baltimore television stations or by WBOC–TV in Salisbury, Maryland, the closest station to southern Delaware.

Baltimore offers absolutely no coverage of Delaware. Philadelphia offers limited coverage of upstate news. The Salisbury station is effectively the only source of television news to residents of southern Delaware. Since WBOC tries to cover Maryland news as a first priority, my constituents suffer the lack of fresh factual news of their state and local area. WBOC has recently opened a news office in my state capital. Conditions have improved, but remain unacceptable.

Viewers of portions of southern Delaware do not have the opportunity to see what news is being carried by Philadelphia stations because of FCC signal carriage rules which exclude Philadelphia coverage unless it was carried prior to 1972. FCC rules and decisions have effectively discriminated against Delaware viewers in many respects. When several Baltimore stations are carried on cable television while no Philadelphia stations are carried, only Baltimore sports, Baltimore oriented news, Baltimore interests are viewed. The same would hold true if only Philadelphia stations were aired along with WBOC in Salisbury though perhaps not to the same degree since WBOC–TV is a Baltimore owned and affiliated station.

The most I would hope for is a commercial television station located in Delaware. The least I could conscientiously accept is a break-up of the hold on the many Delaware viewers who receive only the Baltimore perspective; that is, allowing a Philadelphia station to be carried by cable for the areas that do not now have the benefit even if it means trading off one of the three Baltimore major network carriers for a Philadelphia carrier of the same network.

Population centers have shifted since the FCC set standards in 1953. The population of southeastern Delafare is greatly expanding; the needs are changing. One great need is adequate coverage of news and local events to keep the public informed.

I am therefore asking you to re-evaluate the rules which restrict the number and type of stations carried on cable as they apply to southern Delaware. I also am requesting information which would show what steps could be taken to allow a commercial television station in Delaware.

The above requested information will be greatly appreciated. Please reply to my staff assistant, Jim Tull, at 6021 Federal Building, 844 King Street, Wilmington, Delaware 19801.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH R. BIDEN, Jr.,
United States Senator.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., February 24, 1978.

HON. JOSEPH R. BIDEN, JR.,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BIDEN: This is written in response to your recent letter concerning broadcast television coverage of Delaware news and the current signal carriage rules affecting the operation of Delaware cable television systems. James R. Hobson, Chief of the Commission's Cable Television Bureau, to whom you sent a copy of your letter, has contributed to this response, insofar as it addresses cable television matters. Please excuse our delay in providing this response. A copy is being sent to your assistant, Jim Tull.

Turning first to the broadcast news coverage issue, you should be aware that licensees of television stations are obliged to provide programming, which may include news stories, addressing the needs and interests of those residing within their service areas. Several stations, licensed to Maryland and Pennsylvania cities, are providing broadcast service to parts of Delaware and are required to program for the Delaware residents therein. Any allegation of these stations' failure to offer such programming will be given consideration during the license renewal process.

You are correct in your statement that no operating commercial television station currently is licensed to a Delaware city. However, the Commission's table of television assignments shows an "unreserved" channel allocation (which can be used for commercial broadcast purposes) for Wilmington, Delaware. Thus, that channel (Channel 61) is available for any applicant wishing to operate a Delaware commercial station. It may be that additional channel assignments could be made to Delaware, including the southern part of the state, if technical interference criteria do not otherwise preclude such assignment revisions. Basic information on how to apply for a broadcast license is enclosed.

In another portion of your letter you ask that the Commission consider a revision of the cable television signal carriage rules which prohibit cable systems in southern Delaware from carrying Philadelphia television stations. Like many of its rules of nationwide applicability, the Commission's cable television rules are based on certain assumptions. Two key assumptions are relevant to your inquiry. First, the rules assume that, in smaller television markets such as southern Delaware, once cable subscribers are offered a minimum complement of three full network stations and one independent station, the benefits of any importation of distant signals are outweighed by the presumed threat to the local stations' ability to provide local programming. Second, the rules assume that a station is "local" and entitled to cable carriage if it is either located nearby or its signal is "significantly viewed" in the area. ("Significantly viewed" is a term applied to a station's off-the-air viewing which, according to audience measurement surveys, has met certain minimum percentage standards of audience share and weekly viewing.) In Sussex County, Delaware, the Philadelphia television stations apparently are not available off-the-air, or at least are not listed as significantly viewed. On the other hand, the Baltimore network affiliates, the Salisbury commercial station (WBOC–TV) and a Washington, D.C. independent station appear to receive significant viewership in the county. Thus the Commission Rules treat them as "local" stations.

Your request would mean permitting carriage of one or more Philadelphia signals in addition to or in lieu of certain "local" signals. Addition of a Philadelphia signal raises concerns over economic impact, primarily on the Salisbury station, the market of which includes most of Sussex County. Bringing in a Philadelphia signal to replace a Baltimore station presents two additional concerns. First, it means that the Baltimore station is cut off from viewers within its coverage area. Second, it means that subscribers will not have access to a signal on cable that they can view off-the-air without cable. This creates dissatisfaction for both the subscribers and the cable system operator.

The Commission has a special relief procedure through which its rules can be waived if it can be shown that the assumptions on which they are based are unsupported in a particular case. There is a heavy burden of proof placed upon such waiver petitioners. However, if it can be shown, for example, that the Salisbury station and its program service would not be harmed or that the Philadelphia stations should be considered "local" stations, a waiver might be possible. Cable carriage, in Sussex County, of Philadelphia stations' programs of specific Delaware interest might also be considered in a special relief proceeding.

I hope the foregoing has been responsive to your letter. Please feel free to contact me or the Chief of the Cable Television Bureau if any further questions arise.

Sincerely,

WALLACE E. JOHNSON,
Chief, Broadcast Bureau.

DELAWARE ASKS END TO CABLE TV RULES

(By Larry Kramer)

Some people in Delaware cannot understand who is benefiting from federal regulation of cable television operations there.

So, they have asked the Federal Communications Commission to forget about Delaware, and stop regulating cable TV.

Since Delaware is the only state in the union without its own commercial television, it is sorely lacking in television news and public affairs programing for residents of the state.

But present federal regulation prevents many of the cable operations in the southern part of the state from carrying some Philadephia stations that cover Delaware news public affairs programs.

Currently Sussex residents can receive cable transmission from Baltimore (network affiliates), Washington (one independent) and Salisbury, Md., television stations..

FCC signal carriage rules exclude Philadelphia stations from the area because they were not carried there before 1972, when the law prohibiting cable transmissions from that distance were created.

But, as Sen. Joseph Biden, Jr. (D–Del.) said in a letter to the FCC, "Baltimore offers absolutely no coverage of Delaware."

Since Delaware's state capital, Wilmington, is north, within the Philadelphia broadcast area, Philadelphia stations do carry news of statewide interest to Delaware.

So, Biden asked, "The least I could conscientiously accept is a break-up of the hold on the many Delaware viewers who receive only the Baltimore perspective; that is, allowing a Philadelphia station to be carried by cable for the areas that do not now have the benefit—even if it means trading off one of the three Baltimore major network carriers."

But the Sussex committee went further. This week it asked for suspension of all regulations "respecting distant signal carriage for all present and future cable television systems in Sussex County, Delaware and the state of Delaaware."

The case bears some similarity to a request from the state of New Jersey's cable office. New Jersey, overwhelmed by New York and Philadelphia network affiliates, has also petitioned the FCC for suspension of regulations concerning cable operations.

In that still undecided case, a Justice Department comment supported New Jersey. One Justice source said yesterday that the department is likely to support the people of Sussex as well.

"The question is, just what people are being protected by the FCC?" the Justice Department official asked. The state legislature, the Sussex County Council, 4,049 residents who signed the petition submitted to the FCC, "and just about everyone else in the state is asking for this relief," says the official. "So why not? I can't find anybody in the state who won't benefit."

In a letter responding to Biden, FCC Broadcast Bureau Chief Wallace Johnson said that one reason not to let the Philadelphia stations be carried on cable in southern Delaware is that the move could hurt one or more Baltimore stations, which are received on the air by some Sussex residents.

Johnson defines "local" stations as those whose signals are seen by a significant number of area viewers. He doesn't address the fact that Baltimore stations don't carry Delaware news, except to say that "any allegation of these stations' failure to offer such programing will be given consideration during the license renewal process." ●

THE NEUTRON BOMB

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, last week when President Carter announced that he would cancel the production of the neutron bomb, I was as surprised as everyone else. I immediately sent a telegram to the President urging him to reconsider his decision. With some relief I heard that he had compromised and just delayed the production. Unfortunately this tactic seems to be used all too much in the Carter administration. In the past he has "delayed" the production of the MX missile, using a target date of 3 years, but that is shrouded in ambiguous rhetoric, and no one is sure when, if ever, the MX will go into production.

I compare this decision to the reported protocol of the SALT II Treaty being negotiated in Geneva. While the administration has defended the terms of the protocol, which call for a ban on the testing and deployment of certain weapons, including the MX, on the grounds that the protocol will expire in 3 years, sources of my own have informed me that it is the intention of the influential people within the arms control community of the administration to make the terms of the protocol permanent in the future. Now that the United States has shown a desire to prevent the neutron bomb from becoming part of the United States and NATO arsenal, the leaders in the Kremlin know that the massive propaganda campaign that they initiated has had some effect upon President Carter.

In this mornings Washington Post this subject was discussed by Evans and Novak. They have indicated that it was this propaganda that played a major factor in his decision to cancel and that the criticism of that decision by the major newspaper of the Nation were the dominating influence in forcing him to reconsider and announce that he would only delay the production. The most disturbing aspect of this whole affair is that the President neglected the advice of those who are best in a position to advise him on security and defense matters. Secretary of Defense, Harold Brown, appeared on the CBS show "Face the Nation" yesterday, and in a statement very well couched in cautiousness, left the distinct impression that he favored the production of the neutron bomb at this time.

Mr. President, I am concerned that it is this type of indecision and lack of firmness that has placed the United States in the position that we now find ourselves in world politics and influence. The nations of Western Europe were not kept advised of the President's intentions, probably because the President himself did not know his true intentions. The nations of NATO know that the neutron bomb is essential to the defense of Western Europe. They are in support of the production of the weapon at this time. The Warsaw Pact nations have a tremendous advantage in the number of tanks deployed along the borders of Central Europe. It is a known fact that if and when these tanks are used in an attack, it will be in a blitzkrieg fashion. This is the basic manner in the use of large armor forces. With the NATO ability to stop such an advance almost nonexistent, the neutron bomb would have provided the West with an alternative to defend against this type of invasion by the Warsaw Pact. What they, the leaders of NATO, must think now is anybody's guess. If the speculation that this was a decision based primarily on political consideration, influenced by political advisers, hold to be true, then the President needs to reevaluate the decisionmaking process within the White House.

Mr. President, I ask that the article from today's Washington Post by Evans and Novak be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

BEHIND THE NEUTRON DECISION

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

President Carter's decision to put the neutron "bomb" in cold storage has created a dangerous leadership crisis not only in the Western alliance he is supposed to lead but at the bewildered highest levels of his own administration as well.

"As of March 23, every top official in this administration, and many just under the top, favored full speed ahead on the neutron," one middle-level official appointed by the president told us. Yet, on that day, Carter decided to cancel the enhanced radiation warhead designed to spare both civilians and structures while immobilizing enemy tanks. There was no significant new consultation with senior advisers.

Why did he take that step, by which, whatever his intention, he seems to have succumbed to Soviet pressure and abandoned his March 17 Wake Forest pledge to demand tit-for-tat concessions from Moscow? Nobody is sure. Explanations range from failure of the neutron warhead to meet the president's technical-engineering standards to his emotional quest for a nuclear-free world.

Some administration officials feel political pressure will force Carter to order production. But even so, an attempt to trace what happened finds disconcerting answers: Although the decision-making process is chaotic, blame attaches directly to the president, not to his aides.

The only high official who had publicly expressed concern over the neutron warhead was U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young, whose jurisdictional connection is dim. Everybody else of importance argued forcefully for the warhead, even if only as a bargaining chip. That included Defense Secretary Harold Brown, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Young's public opposition was mild. But privately, just before he and Carter sojourned to Latin America and Africa, Young told the president: This is a terrible, terrible weapon. How can we go to the special U.N. session on disarmament with this on our hands?

But Young is not perceived by close Carter-watchers as the only influence. Hamilton Jordan, Carter's political aide who is now privy to every presidential decision in foreign-military policy, is privately regarded as "the missing link" in the chain of advice that routed the Vance-Brown-Brzezinski regulars. "It's heart-breaking," one official who blames Jordan told us. "The whole government was going the other way."

In the background was the Soviet propaganda campaign. European heads of state—and particularly left and center-left parliamentarians—were warned that a go-ahead would have ominous results on Soviet conduct in Western Europe.

Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev sent personal letters to President Valery Giscard d'Estaing of France and other NATO heads of state that were quickly forwarded to Carter. The presumption is that those dire warnings had an effect on the president.

Moscow's propaganda campaign peaked when the Kremlin-controlled World Peace Council held an anti-neutron "conference" in Washington Jan. 25. Several congressmen who fought appropriations for the neutron last September were invited to the first Washington rally of that Helsinki-based council (though we find no record of any having attended). The Soviet propaganda campaign is under direct control of Politbur member Boris Ponomarev, who visited Washington this year.

The effect of that campaign was described last week by Sen. Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) as Moscow's "most successful" propagandizing in postwar history. At least it probably escalated Young's concern over how a neutron go-ahead would affect President Carter's scheduling appearance at the United Nations next month.

Some Carter insiders feel that the president, as in the coal strike, failed to focus on the neutron issue until far too late, giving the impression he was for production but not entirely committing himself. An almost exact parallel can be found in the astonished reaction within the administration last summer when, contrary to expectations, he canceled the B1 bomber.

According to one highly credible theory, Carter did not truly come to grips with the neutron until just before his Latin American trip. He made the decision in the near isolation of his inner White House staff, flabbergasting his foreign- and military-policy markers and undermining his European allies.

The last effort to switch Carter's position came on the long Air Force One ride back to Washington from Liberia. Vance and Brzezinski huddled with the president, pressing him to change his mind.

But what finally persuaded him to announce his decision last Friday to "defer" production—instead of cancel it outright—was not those advisers but the firestorm of criticism in The New York Times, The Washington Post and other influential papers.

That leaves the president facing disorder, disillusionment and incredulity among the men he named to guide his national security apparatus. That witches' brew of discontent could prove even more disabling to him than the wreckage of the neutron policy now strewn across Western Europe.●

PRESIDENT CEAUSESCU OF ROMANIA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, later this week President Nicolae Ceausescu of Romania will pay a State visit to the United States. I want to join many other Americans in offering words of welcome. We all look forward to his visit. He comes to Washington at an important stage for both of our countries—as we continue to expand the economic and humanitarian and political ties between us, as we seek to improve East-West relations in all aspects, and as we move to reduce international tensions in key areas of the world.

President Ceausescu has consistently demonstrated great leadership and statesmanship, qualities which immediately impressed me when I first met with him in 1974. I am sure that these qualities will be evident in Washington this week, as well as in the months ahead when we can look forward to the further development of our important relationship.●

JOSEPH F. DEEB

● Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to the death of a distinguished lawyer, Joseph F. Deeb of the Michigan and District of Columbia Bars.

Joe Deeb graduated from the University of Notre Dame. At age 31 he was one of the youngest men appointed as U.S. attorney. He was named in 1940 to serve in the western district of Michigan.

Mrs. Griffin and I extend our deep sympathy to his family.●

THE 80th ANNIVERSARY OF THE FRATERNAL ORDER OF EAGLES

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, in one of his last major public appearances, the late Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY addressed a Fraternal Order of Eagles convention in his home State of Minnesota. As a member of the Eagles throughout his adult life, Mr. HUMPHREY knew well the work, principles and dedication of this fine organization he fondly referred to as the "fraternity of the common man."

As this year marks the 80th anniversary of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, I would like to take this opportunity to draw the attention of my colleagues to that most eloquent speech by Mr. HUMPHREY.

I ask that the text be printed in full in the RECORD.

The material follows:

THE HONORABLE HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

(United States Senator, State of Minnesota): Ladies and Gentlemen, it seems to me that I was once Mayor of this great City, but I am very honored to know that you are the Grand Worthy President-Elect. I tried for that a long time and never made it. (Laughter.)

I am very proud of our own President from Minnesota, Clyde Schmieg, of Aerie 33 over at St. Paul. We're very proud of him. (Applause.)

I was told that this is a night for entertainment, and I don't intend to burden your time with too much serious talk.

I understand that Foster Brooks is here, and I want to be around to see that fellow I'm telling you. He really is, well I'd say that he's the best answer to alcoholism that I've ever seen. He really is. (Laughter.) He's a marvelous character actor and a fine gentleman that I have had a chance to meet on other occasions.

This is our seventy-ninth—and I say "ours" because I am very proud—meeting, as early in my life, when I was a very young man in this City I was presented with the Gold Card of Lifetime Membership in the Fraternal Order of Eagles, and I'm very proud of that membership. (Applause and Cheers.)

And I'm very proud that my colleague of those early days and good personal friend, now Vice President of the United States, is a member of our fraternal Order as well. (Applause and Cheers.)

And we had six Presidents I know that have been—at least six—members of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, and two of them I loved above all—Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, and my Lord, John Kennedy—three of them. (Laughter, Applause and Cheers.)

And you had a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The former and late Justice Earl Warren joined this Fraternal Order of Eagles. And you have had many great people of this country.

I recognized that from an article about my friend, John Dent—a marvelous article and portrait about the Fraternal Order of Eagles, written by Maury Splain; and that article I think tells more about this Fraternity than anything I have ever heard or read.

And somewhere in that, Maury, is this line, and I just picked it out—"It is the Fraternity of the common man".

This is the Fraternity of Americans.

It's the Fraternity of people of high places, and people who are struggling to make a go of it. As somebody put it, it is the Fraternity of the famous and the obscure.

It's the Fraternity of the high ranking and the humble.

It's the Fraternity of the great and also of the small.

But above all, it is the Fraternity of our country.

No fraternal organization has been more dedicated to the principles of this country. No fraternal organization has demonstrated any more patriotism.

No fraternal organization is known more for its charity; for its concern of the living conditions of our citizens than the Fraternity to which you and I belong, the Fraternal Order of Eagles. And I'm proud to be a member and to be here. (Applause and Cheers)

When I go back—and it's been publicized at some time—I think it was the Fraternal Order of Eagles long ago that fought for old age pensions, first out there in the State of Montana.

When I think of the time when the Social Security Act was signed by Mr. Roosevelt, a member of this great Fraternity, he turned around and presented the pen with which he signed that law to the Grand Worthy President of our organization.

Social Security—pensions; health research; care of the elderly, all sorts of things—youth programs for our youngsters that need so much help these days—this organization has been in the forefront of all of them.

When I came in the door out there, just as I walked in I saw the Max Baer Heart Fund. Well, I used to be one of Max Baer's fans when he was heavyweight champion of the world.

And then I know of your Jimmy Durante Youth Fund, and Jimmy Durante is one of my very close friends. He's not well these days, but I know over the years he's been our house guest right in Minnesota.

So when you think of these fine and distinguished people that you did honor to, and who were able to make generous contributions, one can't help but be proud.

In 1950, as you know better than I, this organization—before any other even dreamed of it—raised a million dollars for the Damon Runyon Cancer Fund.

And this organization on and to this very day is still raising money for the Cancer Fund, for the Art Ehrmann Cancer Fund.

Ladies and gentlemen, as one who has gone through the ravages and suffering of this disease and has to put up the fight every day, wondering when something will come and will break through that will give relief from pain, suffering, and fear, all I can say to each of you out there is thank you and God bless you. You've done so much for so many, and you show it.

When I walked into this hotel tonight, out there as I came into the street out in front of the Radisson Hotel and have for every conceivable occasion, I sensed a spirit of happiness, and a spirit of vitality; and that's what it is all about.

This is a cross-section of America, and let me say to those who try to run us down, and for those who would have us believe—and have so many of our young people take their beliefs—that we don't know what we're doing; that we walk our own way; that we're nothing but materialists, and we really don't care any more, let me say they are dead wrong.

This country doesn't need bicentennials to remind us of what we stand for.

I'll tell you what we stand for—a chance for every man, woman, and child.

We stand for a better life. We know that it can't be perfect in our time, but we seek to ease the pain and the suffering; to help the widow and the orphan; to see that those who are in the twilight of their lives can have some comfort and some security.

We seek to break through in our society so that we can cure disease; can wrest and rescue our young people from the troubles that seem to beset so many of them. That's what it's all about.

I had a speech prepared, and I know it was a wingdinger, I'm here to tell you. (Laughter) My good friend Crist Seraphim, from Milwaukee, is waiting for me to pull that speech out. But, Crist, I'm not going to do it.

I'll tell you why I'm not going to do it.

You know what you need to know already. You know what this organization is all about. You know that you had led the way long before government ever showed concern about the elderly; long before government got into cancer research you were there. You have pointed the way.

You've helped the veterans.
You've helped the sick.
You've helped the needy.
You've helped the old.
You've helped the young.
You've helped the children.
Why?

Because we are just all people, all of us. We come from all walks of life. This is not a "blue blood" organization. We are red-blooded Americans—that's what we are! (Applause).

I welcome this. I love this country. I've been in public life a long time, and in public life I've made my fair share of mistakes, just as we do in our private life.

But let me assure you of one thing—in all the years I've been in public life I have watched this country go through wars and depression—the recessions—the incredibly bad times, but each time we come out of it a little better—a little better.

The headlines would have you believe that today was the only day that there was trouble in Washington; today was the only day that there was trouble in the countryside.

It's not true. America was born in trouble. George Washington, who led us in our fight for independence, struggled to get an army. As I used to say when I was teaching, out of all the people in the Colonies less than a third were for independence; one-third was for the King; and the other third waited to see how it came out. (Laughter)

My friends, great decisions are seldom made by majorities. Great decisions are made by people of conscience, who may band together, like we have in this organization, to do things that need to be done.

So thank you for coming to Minneapolis. I love this City.

Thank you for coming to Minnesota. We tried to put on some fairly good weather for you. We hope that it will continue. We hope and I think that you will enjoy this beautiful community, the Twin Cities and the metropolitan area.

I know you have very busy days, but get around; see our parks, our lakes; see where our people live. See them at work. See them at play. Drive around our countryside. See that corn that we raise out there.

Boy, if we could just get a little better price—that's all! (Laughter and Applause)

Just see this wonderful, wonderful country.

And ladies and gentlemen, wherever you go in this land there are places of beauty, and there are wonderful people. I've traveled in every state in America many times, and I have traveled in sixty-some countries. I've been in every country, without exception, in Europe. I have been in the countries of eastern Africa, and Latin-America. And I'll tell you—every time I go, no matter when I go—how great it is, when I get home I am ready to sing, "God Bless America". I don't have a good enough voice but I sure want to sing it every time I come home.

Now tonight, dear friends, I'm going to travel some 38 miles west of here. I'm going out and see my favorite girl friend. Boy, is she nice! I am going to see her. I have stayed with her for 45 years, for 45 years! That is by this September. About three and a half of those I was trying to trap her. Trying to convince her at that time that I was going to make it, even though I was stone broke. And she was pretty with little baby blue eyes.

And I was trying to tell her, "Honey, don't look at me now. Just think what you can make out of me."

And I'm happy to tell you she had quite a job. Once in a while she felt she came through with some improvement. (Laughter)

But tonight I shall be out with my wife, with my grandchildren, and with some of my constituents. We happily have 10 grandchildren. We have three sons and a daughter. We have a lovely family.

And no matter what pain or suffering—and no matter what disappointments we have, when you are blessed with family and grandchildren, and blessed with the chance to live in America, all I can say is you're a lucky person.

Thank you very, very much. [Applause.]

Grand Worthy President-Elect Tony Angelo. We know you are here because you know what the Eagles are all about and what makes up this great Order of ours.

But I just want to take one moment, Senator Humphrey, to tell you that the people that are seated here this evening, and the people that they represent, during the course of the years spend many hours, much of their time and their energy to raise money, during the course of the year, so that they can bring it to the Convention.

And there is approximately one million dollars during the course of the year that these people raise, and from this we are able to present to you, on behalf of the Eagles, the Auxiliary and the Aerie alike, to the Minnesota Medical Foundation Cancer Research Fund, University Hospital, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis, Minnesota, a check for $25,000.00

PRESENTATION—APPLAUSE

Senator HUMPHREY: We are making great strides in cancer research, truly. I was at the National Cancer Institute just the other night getting some chemotherapy, which doesn't make you feel very good.

And one of the topnotchers said to me, "Well Senator, we hope that by September and not later than October, we're going to have an entirely new drug that you can take that will be literally like a miracle." He said the reports are fantastic.

And ladies and gentlemen, today in Hodgkin's Disease, and breast cancer, and so many, many different types of cancer, we have made amazing progress—amazing progress.

And yet you and I know that this disease is like an epidemic in our society today. So what are you doing here is to help one of the great research centers. There are 19 or 20 great research centers in the United States. One is at the University of Minnesota.

And when I was asked what I would like to have this contribution go to, I know what they are doing out here in children's leukemia. I know the work they are doing, and I know that this $25,000.00 is going to help a doctor and a research specialist out there do the things that you would want done.

And only God knows who next will be the victim.

Thank you much. [Applause.]●

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, appoints the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) as a Congressional Adviser to the SALT delegation in Geneva during 1978.

SALT AND THE SOVIET-CUBAN PRESENCE IN AFRICA

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, this morning the Subcommittee on Intelligence of the Committee on Armed Services heard disturbing testimony from the Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency concerning Soviet and Cuban aggression in Africa.

"The degree of Soviet and Cuban military activity in Subsaharan Africa is unprecedented," the Deputy Director of CIA, Mr. Frank Carlucci, told the subcommittee in a prepared statement that was made available to the news media.

"We are witnessing the most determined campaign to expand foreign influence in this troubled region since it was carved up by the European powers in the late 19th century," Mr. Carlucci continues.

The degree of Soviet activity is massive, Mr. President. "Soviet military equipment has been flowing into Ethiopia and Angola faster than the local forces can absorb it," Mr. Carlucci points out.

Mr. President, there are now more than 400 Soviet tanks in Ethiopia alone. In addition, the Soviet Union has supplied more than 50 MIG fighters to the Ethiopians, along with large quantities of armored cars, personnel carriers, and artillery.

Who is supplied with this materiel? Only the Ethiopians? No. Not only the Ethiopians, but more than 16,000 Cuban troops, and a large number of Soviet and Cuban general officers, who plan and coordinate combat operations for the Cuban and Ethiopian troops.

News reports have painted a grim picture of what all of this costs in human suffering. In dollars, CIA estimates that the Soviet Union has poured close to $1 billion into Ethiopia alone.

Soviet presence in Angola is equally large. "Tons of Soviet military hardware litter the docks at Luanda" Mr. Carlucci says, "and Soviet or Cuban advisers are found at every level of government."

The Cuban presence in Angola is greater than the Cuban presence in Ethiopia, Mr. President. Additionally, Cuban and Soviet "advisers" can be found at every level of the Government of Angola.

In the remainder of Subsaharan Africa, Soviet advisers and Soviet equipment can be found as part of a number of so-called liberation movements and revolutionary regimes.

What does all of this mean for peace in Africa? I am afraid that it means that peace is remote in Africa as long as the Soviets and their surrogate soldiers, the Cubans, are allowed to roam the African continent with impunity.

What can the United States do to help bring an end to this Soviet and Cuban plunder of Africa? Do we need to send in arms ourselves? Must we, too, commit troops to the African continent? Must Africa become another Vietnam for the United States?

There are options available for the United States which do not involve the commitment of U.S. money, arms, or troops. One option centers around the ongoing Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) in which the United States and the Soviet Union are engaged.

If the Soviets want a SALT II agreement as much as the administration would have us believe they do, then why not tell the Soviets, "Cease aggression in Africa, or no SALT."

For Americans already dubious about the SALT II proposal as they now perceive it, the administration could enhance its position with the public and the Senate by tying success in a SALT agreement to Soviet and Cuban withdrawal from Africa.

In doing so, the administration would be putting out two potential fires with one act: (1) limiting the spread of strategic nuclear arms; and (2) ending Soviet and Cuban aggression in Africa, thereby helping to stabilize the area and bring peace to its people.

What more noble deed could the administration do, given President Carter's longstanding desire to limit and end the arms race and bring peace and stability to Africa?

Mr. President, Mr. Carlucci has provided the Senate with important information about the scope and degree of Cuban and Soviet involvement in Africa. This information cannot be ignored. By bringing to light the huge scale of Soviet involvement in Africa, he has provided the public with a warning and the President with an opportunity.

The American people will not be encouraged by what Mr. Carlucci has said today. Nor will this information enhance the President's chances of getting a SALT II agreement through the Senate. Only by tying success in obtaining a SALT II agreement to Soviet and Cuban cessation of hostilities in Africa can the President begin to hope to secure passage of the type of SALT agreement that he now seems to be working toward, in this Senator's opinion. Perhaps even this linkage will not be enough, given what we known about the nature of the proposed SALT II agreement at this point.

Mr. President, so that my colleagues may benefit from Mr. Carlucci's testimony, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY DEPUTY DIRECTOR OF CENTRAL INTELLIGENCE

MR. CHAIRMAN: I welcome the opportunity to appear before your Subcommittee this morning. Admiral Turner asked that I convey to you his regrets that he is unable to be present but he had a previously scheduled hearing.

CIA has had a long and, I think, mutually profitable relationship with your parent Committee. Both the Director and I look forward to the same relationship with the Subcommittee on Intelligence. We will be happy to appear before you to provide intelligence assessments of world developments and we shall certainly do everything we can to assist you in exercising your oversight role.

This morning, we are going to discuss with you the foreign military presence in Africa. I am sure you understand that much of this briefing is, and must remain, classified. But, I think I might make a few general observations before the session is closed.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, I have had some experience in African affairs. Speaking from this background, let me state that the degree of Soviet and Cuban military activity in Subsaharan Africa is unprecedented. We are witnessing the most determined campaign to expand foreign influence in this troubled region since it was carved up by the European powers in the late 19th century.

Soviet military equipment has been flowing into Ethiopia and Angola faster than the local forces can absorb it. Tank deliveries to Ethiopia exceed 400; more than 50 MIG fighters have gone to Addis Ababa as have huge quantities of armored cars, personnel carriers, and artillery. Soviet and Cuban general officers plan and coordinate combat operations involving more than 16,000 Cuban troops. The Soviet military aid commitment to Ethiopia now ranges close to one billion US dollars.

In Angola, tons of Soviet military hardware litter the docks at Luanda and Soviet or Cuban advisors are found at every level of the government. There are more Cuban soldiers in Angola than in Ethiopia; thousands of them engaged in active combat against UNITA in the southern part of the country.

Elsewhere in Subsaharan Africa we also see Soviet equipment delivered to liberation movements and self-styled revolutionary regimes where Cubans, together with Soviets, train the recipients in its use.

It is my view that Moscow and Havana intend to take advantage of every such opportunity to demonstrate that those who accept their political philosophy can also count on receiving their assistance when it is needed.

CONGRESSMAN QUESTIONS ENERGY INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, I should like to call attention to a valuable article on our energy situation that appeared in the Washington Post of April 9, 1978.

The article is by Representative DAVE STOCKMAN, a freshman Republican, who is a member of the Energy and Power Subcommittee that deals with many energy issues. Congressman STOCKMAN makes the very important point that we should be trying to supply American energy needs at the lowest possible cost. That is the true consumerist position. Yet the Carter energy plan, as his article brilliantly shows, is totally dedicated to creating higher costs for energy by suppressing domestic production at economical prices while mandating uneconomical conservation and foreign imports.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ILLOGIC OF ENERGY INDEPENDENCE

(By Dave Stockman)

One of the most pernicious forces loose in Washington is the widely shared belief in the need for national energy independence. Beguiled by its deceptive allure, we are fashioning policies that would undermine our economy, further weaken our balance-of-payments position, and foist on the American people an unnecessary expansion of government control and cost.

The Carter administration's National Energy Plan raises the quest for energy self-sufficiency to a new plateau of illogic. It amounts to little more than a hastily compiled list of costly expedients for reducing the volume of oil imports. As such, it is not an energy policy at all but a throwback to antiquated notions of general autarky.

It is time to state the terrifying truth to Messrs. Schlesinger and Carter: The level of oil imports per se doesn't matter. What is important is that the energy needs of the U.S. economy be supplied at the lowest possible cost. In practical terms, this can be achieved by increased production of domestic oil and gas, coal substitution and energy conservation—but only to the extent possible at a cost equal to or less than the prevailing price of energy in the world economy—$13 per barrel equivalent.

To reach this goal of supplying our energy needs at the least cost, we do not need a Project Independence, a National Energy Plan, Department of Energy regulatory programs, mandatory efficiency standards, or subsidized development of "energy alternatives." The market is fully capable of accomplishing this at the world price without the guidance of Congress and the executive branch.

Even at the present artificially low domestic energy prices imposed by oil and gas regulatory controls, the boom in such products as insulation, engineered fireplaces and industrial heat recovery systems demonstrates that both the household and business sectors of the economy will respond to pricing signals.

Indeed, the only major unfinished business in energy policy is the creation of a domestic energy pricing structure tied to the world price of oil. Rapid decontrol of oil and gas prices and the adjustment of utility rate schedules to reflect true costs of providing service to all customers would accomplish this with a minimum of regulatory cost. With a realistic price structure in place, the relentless cost-minimizing pressures of the marketplace would drive domestic energy production to its maximum and reduce consumption to its minimum at cost levels equivalent to the world price.

The result would be a significant reduction in U.S. oil imports. But, unlike the arbitrary displacement imposed by the Carter plan, it would be an efficient and beneficial reduction. The market will forgo $13 imported oil only when coal substitution energy, or conservation energy, or new domestic oil and gas reserves are available at a lower cost. The market will not choose $18 conservation energy, $20 coal conversion or $24 synthetic crude over $13 imported oil. And it shouldn't. The strength of our economy and our international competitive position can be maintained only if we purchase all our energy supplies at the lowest price available—even if that means turning to the world oil market for a significant portion of our needs.

The mandatory coal conversion program is the heart of the administration's oil import reduction program. It is also the best demonstration of the bad economics of the Carter plan.

Coal is cheaper than $13 oil for operating large new utility and industrial boilers, primarily because of the economies of scale involved in coal transport, handling, storage, combustion and pollution control. Not surprisingly, the market already has recognized that coal is the lowest-cost alternative for large new facilities. Virtually all large boilers ordered in the past two years have been coal-fired.

These large new facilities will use coal without bureaucratic prodding. The real brunt of the Carter coal conversion program would fall on existing facilities and small industrial boilers, neither of which could ever be operated on coal for under $13 per barrel equivalent in fully allocated costs. These facilities would be compelled to use up to $20 per barrel coal "conversion energy" in place of $13 oil. The administration's plan would thus impose energy cost structures far in excess of the prevailing world price on large segments of U.S. industrial production.

The administration isn't the only perpetrator of such bad bargains. Sen. Russell Long's plan to make $16 shale oil competitive via a $3-a-barrel tax credit involves the dubious bargain of spending $16 of national income to save $13.

The truth is that spending $16 or more to save $13 is the essence of the National Energy Plan, Project Independence and all their progeny. Every panacea being pushed in the policy arena today—subsidized acceleration of the fast breeder, federally financed synthetic fuels development, subsidized solar power installation, more draconian conservation measures such as thermal efficiency standards for existing housing, mandatory industrial efficiency standards, gas guzzler taxes—involves the forced feeding of energy into the economy at costs far above world oil prices.

Washington does not have a great reputation for economic acumen, but the present wholesale stampede to adopt bad economic bargains requires more of an explanation than simple ignorance. The explanation lies in two unsupportable notions that have been incorporated into the conventional wisdom.

The first is that world markets are running out of energy supplies and can't be relied upon much longer—so we must go it alone. The nonsense of this proposition is revealed best by the fact that in the 100-year history of the petroleum age, the world economy has thus far succeeded in consuming only 8 percent of the conservatively estimated resource base of natural gas and 15 percent of oil resources.

Even with today's still imperfect geologic knowledge, using cautious pre-1973 estimates, there are nearly 3,000 trillion barrels of oil and gas left—enough to last the world another half century even at double current rates of consumption. And that is to say nothing of the far more prodigious endowment of lower grade resources—25,000 trillion barrels of coal and geopressurized gas alone—that could be upgraded to refinery and pipeline quality fuels when price and cost levels warrant it.

The second bit of nonsense is that although the raw supplies may be there, the market mechanism itself has disappeared; OPEC is alleged to have suspended or superseded the economic rules of supply and demand, and what may have once been an international energy marketplace has now become a wholly political arena of intrigue, power plays and peril. Were we to abandon the quest for energy independence, the argument goes, U.S.-stimulated growth of world oil demand would encourage OPEC to substantially increase the price again during the 1980s. Given the oil and gas exploration boom underway all over the globe, this scenario seems wholly unconvincing unless bolstered with fudge-factory numbers like those contained in the now discredited CIA study of last April.

But even if there is some slight probability that OPEC will increase the world oil price significantly during the mid-1980s, the argument is irrelevant. One is tempted to ask Secretary Schlesinger why it is so bad to permit OPEC to inflict an $18 energy price regime on the U.S. economy in 1985, but patriotic and virtuous to empower his department to do the same thing in 1978.

In reality, the only result of the administration's high-cost strategy of oil import abstinence would be to keep the world oil price at $13 for a few years or even a decade longer than otherwise, with most of the benefit accruing to Western Europe and Japan.

There are reasonable prospects, however, that the world price of oil will not rise appreciably in real terms over the next decade or so. It is becoming increasingly clear that there may be an effective ceiling on world energy prices in the range of $18 to $24 a barrel for decades to come. At those price levels, the supply of non-OPEC conventional oil and gas and unconventional fuels of every sort is so enormous, and the opportunities for major gains in consumption efficiencies so great, that this ceiling is unlikely to be breached for generations, if ever.

Whether OPEC pushes the price of oil to this economic ceiling in the 1980s by withholding production or allows its output to expand to meet world demand at roughly present real price levels depends almost entirely on whether it wants to make a little or a lot of money from its vast remaining geologic endowment. If it wants to make a lot of money, it will keep the price below the economic ceiling, maximize production and earn an indefinite annual 3 to 4 percent real rate of return on the proceeds by purchasing international assets or investing in domestic economic expansion.

Of course, if Mr. Yamani and his colleagues didn't learn anything at Harvard Business School after all, they may push the oil price up to the ceiling during the next decade, only to find their world markets progressively shrinking in response to a flood of competitive alternatives.

In short, the oil withholding game only works when the world market permits oil prices to rise so rapidly that oil in the ground appreciates at a faster real rate than the rate of return available from the proceeds of currently produced oil. That was the unique situation during the first half of this decade.

OPEC leaders are not unmindful that even they have not transcended the rules of the economic game. This was demonstrated at the recent Caracas meeting when they decided to let the real price decline slightly this year rather than incur worsening surpluses.

If OPEC can recognize these things, why can't we? It's time to declare the energy crisis over, finish building the strategic oil reserve to cushion against any short-run contingencies, and abandon our masochistic fling with energy autarky.

NEW YORK CITY MUST STOP WIDESPREAD LOAFING BY CITY EMPLOYEES

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, New York City is, indeed, unique in this country. Among many other achievements where it is in a class by itself is art. It is the art center of this country. It may well be the art center of the world.

An article in yesterday's New York Times stipulated three conditions that the leading art center in a nation should have. These are:

First. Vigorous institutions, that is, museums, galleries, opera houses, theaters, orchestras, concert halls, ballet and dance companies, schools for the arts, publishing houses, and a wide variety of groups representing a broad spectrum of viewpoints and attitudes, conservative as well as innovative.

Second. A large number of aspiring artists beating on the door of these institutions and challenging them to change, improve, experiment, refine, excel.

Third. An exacting public criticism.

New York alone in this country has all these elements and has them in rich abundance. The truly ambitious artist who wants to meet and compete and vie with the best knows that New York City is where it is at. He makes it in New York, he has made it, indeed.

But, Mr. President, that last element—an exacting public criticism—can be a cross for a city to bear, and to be fair about it New York City newspapers often do a superlative job not only in criticizing the arts, but in reporting criticism of the city and how the city operates.

For example yesterday's New York Times reported that State Comptroller Arthur Levitt's auditors have reported what they call a pervasive attitude among workers and supervisors that "they need not provide a productive day's work."

Mr. President, at a time when the Congress is being called upon by the administration to provide for the first time in this Nation's history a guarantee of an American city's securities that is New York City's securities, when that guarantee would be for up to $2 billion, and when that guarantee would be for as long as 15 years, this body has a responsibility to consider the charges from the office of the New York State comptroller very seriously indeed.

This is a time when the city is trying to find ways of balancing its budget—so it can get off the back of the Federal Government and back in the securities market. This report exposes waste so specifically, so well documented that it suggests a major reason why New York City might be best served by withholding Federal aid.

This report finds that typically city park work crews arrived at work sites 95 minutes late—more than an hour and a half—and took lunch periods of an hour and a quarter which was 45 minutes longer than scheduled. They find this typical of city park work crews.

Observations during 5 months of last year indicated that regular parks department crews were averaging less than 50 percent of their workdays in productive effort.

In other words, less than half their workdays producing anything of value to the city.

One estimate was that the projected cost to the city was $16 million for the year. In addition, the auditors found that 6 percent of the department's seasonal employees could not be located at work sites, and that those who did show up for work spent only 75 percent of their time productively. This means that the department suffered $2.2 million more in lost personnel expenditures.

As for the department's supervisor and its inspector general the Levitt report had this to say:

Half of the supervisors were assigned to desk jobs. Shifting them to the field could reduce the average 1-to-33 ratio of foremen to workers to 1-to-17. As for the inspector general he did not spend any of his time on this type of investigation.

Some inspector general.

Mr. President, the city's park commissioner, Gordon Davis, did respond to this report on Saturday by saying that he was moving to strengthen the inspector general's office and that he was also revising methods for field supervision of employees and increasing the unannounced field inspections at all supervisory levels.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to this report because it gives a vivid and clear example of why any action by the Federal Government that eases the tough, hard discipline of a prospective bankruptcy can be a mistake. Why? Because unless the city insists on cutting every possible bit of unproductive expenditure, it will never balance its budget. And while it may make a temporary improvement here and there, it will not make those painful expense cuts often enough or deeply enough unless the alternative is the more painful consequence of bankruptcy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article in the Sunday New York Times by Glenn Fowler entitled "Levitt's Aides Find Pattern of Loafing by Park Workers," be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEVITT'S AIDES FIND PATTERN OF LOAFING BY PARK WORKERS

(By Glenn Fowler)

A systematic pattern of loafing on the job by employees of the New York City Department of Parks and Recreation cost the city more than $18 million last year, State Comptroller Arthur Levitt charged yesterday.

After covertly observing the movements of forestry and maintenance crews in the city's five boroughs, Mr. Levitt's auditors reported finding a "pervasive attitude" among workers and supervisors alike that" "they need not provide a productive day's work."

The report from Mr. Levitt's office, which is charged by the Legislature with auditing every branch of city and state government, comes as the city is negotiating new contracts with several municipal unions and as it is emphasizing the need for greater productivity.

In one example of the findings of the Comptroller's office, there was the following dossier entry on the activities of a five-man crew that left the department's garage in Clove Lakes Park on Staten Island at 9:27 a.m. on Feb. 4, 1977:

NEW DIRECTOR IS NAMED

In response to the Comptroller's findings, and after an investigation of his own, Gordon J. Davis, the city's Parks Commissioner, said yesterday that he had finance and operations division under a new director, Carlo Ingicco, and was moving to strengthen the inspector general's office.

Mr. Davis, a former member of the City Planning Commission, said he was also revising methods for field supervision of employees and increasing the "unannounced field inspections at all supervisory levels."

"The crew proceeded to a work site to a department store and to a doughnut shop, then back to the garage area to unload the cut tree, then to a bank and a bar, where the men stayed for 37 minutes."

Of the 2 hours 13 minutes the crew was observed, Mr. Levitt, said it was nonproductive for 1 hour 19 minutes

* * * * *

lar accounts, replete with late starting times, long breakfast and coffee breaks, personnel errands, leisurely lunch hours and early quitting times. Moreover, the pattern of unproductive work was concealed by "false entries" and other subterfuges in the department's records, according to the audit.

LESS THAN HALF A DAY'S WORK

For example, a four-member Bronx Park crew, observed for more than an hour on Feb. 2, 1977, was found to have taken its truck to an apartment house, a store and a restaurant. But the trip ticket filed at the garage showed that the truck had gone to the Split Rock Golf Course, a city facility, and to a dump. However, there was no record of the truck having appeared at a dump site on that date, the auditors noted.

Typically, Mr. Levitt said, work crews arrived at work sites 95 minutes late and took lunch periods of an hour and a quarter, which was 45 minutes longer than scheduled. In one instance, the auditors said, "we observed a four-man crew take 75 minutes for a breakfast break at a Bronx diner.

Observations during five months of last year indicated, Mr. Levitt said, that regular Parks Department crews were averaging less than 50 percent of their workdays in productive effort. He said the projected cost to the city was $16 million for the year.

In addition, Mr. Levitt's auditors found that 6 percent of the department's seasonal employees could not be located at work sites, and that those who did show up for work spent only 75 percent of their time productively. This meant that the department suffered $2.2 million more in lost personnel expenditures, Mr. Levitt said.

The Comptroller noted tartly that a 50 percent increase in productivity by the Parks Department's staff would more than make up for personnel cuts imposed during the city's budget crisis.

Mr. Levitt was particularly critical of the department's supervisors and its inspector general. Half of the supervisors were assigned to desk jobs, he said, and shifting them to the field could reduce the average 1-to-33 ratio of foremen to workers to 1 to 17. As for the inspector general, he "did not spend any of his time on this type of investigation," the Comptroller added.

THE EFFECTS OF OUR FAILURE TO RATIFY THE GENOCIDE TREATY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I would like to take this time to discuss the international implications of our continued failure to ratify the Genocide Treaty.

Since the Second World War, it has become increasingly obvious that bilateral disputes are of multilateral concern. Because countries have become more interdependent, disruption in one area of the world has significant consequences for the rest of the world. A good example of this is the present conflict in the Middle East.

It is equally obvious that the world's problems cannot be resolved by a fragmented effort. This is why 83 nations have ratified the International Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of Genocide. This treaty declares acts of genocide against national, ethnical, racial, or religious groups crimes under international law. Shockingly, the United States has failed to ratify this treaty. The consequences of this failure are significant.

First, this failure contradicts our efforts to work with other nations to create a more peaceful and humane world. The SALT negotiations and our human rights efforts demonstrate a strong concern for human life; our refusal to ratify the Genocide Treaty undermines these efforts.

Furthermore, our failure to ratify this convention reduces the influence we can bring against the actual commission of such acts, as was shown during the Nigerian Civil War. It discourages other nations from ratifying the treaty and pledging their support for human rights. And it impedes the development of international law in this most important area of human conduct.

A great deal of damage has been done by our failure to ratify the Genocide Treaty. A great deal more will be done if we do not act now. I urge the ratification of this important treaty without further delay.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There are two bills that have been cleared on the calendar, I believe. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Orders Nos. 656 and 666.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I rise only to advise that the majority leader is correct, of course. These two items are cleared on our calendar and we have no objection to proceeding to their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

END STAGE RENAL DISEASE PROGRAM

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 8423) to amend titles II and XVIII of the Social Security Act to make improvements in the end stage renal disease program presently authorized under section 226 of that act, and for other purposes which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That (a) title II of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting immediately after section 226 the following new section:

"SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO COVERAGE UNDER MEDICARE PROGRAM FOR END STAGE RENAL DISEASE

"SEC. 226A. (a) Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in section 226 of title XVIII, every individual who—

"(1)(A) is fully or currently insured (as such terms are defined in section 214 of this Act) or would be fully or currently insured if his service as an employee (as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974) after December 31, 1936, were included in the term 'employment' as defined in this Act, or (B) is entitled to monthly insurance benefits under title II of this Act or an annuity under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974, or (C) is the spouse or dependent child (as defined in regulations) of an individual who is fully or currently insured or would be fully or currently insured if his service as an employee (as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974) after December 31, 1936, were included in the term 'employment' as defined in this Act, or (D) is the spouse or dependent child (as defined in regulations) of an individual entitled to monthly insurance benefits under title II of this Act or an annuity under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974; and

"(2) is medically determined to have end stage renal disease; and

"(3) has filed an application for benefits under this section, shall, in accordance with the succeeding provisions of this section, be entitled to benefits under part A and eligible to enroll under part B of title XVIII, subject to the deductible, premium, and coinsurance provisions of that title.

"(b) Subject to subsection (c), entitlement of an individual to benefits under part A and eligibility to enroll under part B of title XVIII by reasons of this section on the basis of end stage renal disease—

"(1) shall begin with—

"(A) the third month after the month in which a regular course of renal dialysis is initiated, or

"(B) the month in which such individual receives a kidney transplant, or (if earlier) the first month in which such individual is admitted as an inpatient to an institution which is a hospital meeting the requirements of section 1861(e) (and such additional requirements as the Secretary may prescribe under section 1881(b) for such institutions) in preparation for or anticipation of kidney transplanation, but only if such transplantation occurs in that month or in either of the next two months, whichever first occurs (but no earlier than one year preceding the month of the filing of an application for benefits under this section); and

"(2) shall end, in the case of an individual who receives a kidney transplant, with the thirty-sixth month after the month in which such individual receives such transplant or, in the case of an individual who has not received a kidney transplant, and no longer requires a regular course of dialysis, with the twelfth month after the month in which such course of dialysis is terminated.

"(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (b)—

"(1) in the case of any individual who participates in a self-dialysis training program prior to the third month after the month in which such individual initiates a regular course of renal dialysis in a renal dialysis facility or provider of services meeting the requirements of section 1881(b), entitlement to benefits under part A and eligibility to enroll under part B of title XVIII shall begin with the month in which such regular course of renal dialysis is initiated;

"(2) in any case in which a kidney transplant fails (whether during or after the thirty-six-month period specified in subsection (b)(2)) and as a result the individual who received such transplant initiates or resumes a regular course of renal dialysis, entitlement to benefits under part A and eligibility to enroll under part B of title XVIII shall begin with the month in which such course is initiated or resumed; and

"(3) in any case in which a regular course of renal dialysis is resumed subsequent to the termination of an earlier course, entitlement to benefits under part A and eligibility to enroll under part B of title XVIII shall begin with the month in which such regular course of renal dialysis is resumed.".

(b) Section 226 of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out subsections (e), (f), and (g), and

(2) by redesignating subsections (h) and (i) as subsections (e) and (f), respectively.

SEC. 2 Part C of title XVIII of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"MEDICARE COVERAGE FOR END STAGE RENAL DISEASE PATIENTS

"SEC. 1881. (a) The benefits provided by parts A and B of this title shall include benefits for individuals who have been determined to have end-stage renal disease as provided in section 226A, and benefits for kidney donors as provided in subsection (d) of this section. Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the type, duration, and scope of the benefit provided by parts A and B with respect to individuals who have been determined to have end-stage renal disease and who are entitled to such benefits without regard to section 226A shall in no case be less than the type, duration, and scope of the benefits so provided for individuals entitled to such benefits solely by reason of that section.

"(b)(1) Payments under this title with respect to services, in addition to services for which payment would otherwise be made under this title, furnished to individuals who have been determined to have end-stage renal disease shall include (A) payments on behalf of such individuals to providers of services and renal dialysis facilities which meet such requirements as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe for institutional dialysis services and supplies (including self-dialysis services in a self-care dialysis unit maintained by the provider or facility), transplantation services, self-care home dialysis support services which are furnished by the provider or facility, and routine professional services performed by a physician during a maintenance dialysis episode if payments for his other professional services furnished to an individual who has end stage renal disease are made on the basis specified in paragraph (3)(A) of this subsection, and (B) payments to or on behalf of such individuals for home dialysis supplies and equipment. The requirements prescribed by the Secretary under subparagraph (A) shall include requirements for a minimum utilization rate for covered procedures and for self-dialysis training programs.

"(2)(A) With respect to payments for dialysis services furnished by providers of services and renal dialysis facilities to individuals determined to have end-stage renal disease for which payments may be made under part B of this title, such payments (unless otherwise provided in this section) shall be equal to 80 percent of the amounts determined in accordance with subparagraph (B); and with respect to payments for services for which payments may be made under part A of this title, the amounts of such payments (which amounts shall not exceed, in respect to costs in procuring organs attributable to payments made to an organ procurement agency or histocompatibility laboratory, the costs incurred by that agency or laboratory) shall be determined in accordance with section 1861 (v). Payments shall be made to a renal dialysis facility only if it agrees to accept such payments as payment in full for covered services, except for payment by the individual of 20 percent of the estimated amounts for such services calculated on the basis established by the Secretary under subparagraph (B) and the deductible amount imposed by section 1833(b).

"(B) The Secretary shall prescribe in regulations any methods and procedures to (i) determine the costs incurred by providers of services and renal dialysis facilities in furnishing covered services to individuals determined to have end-stage renal diseases, and (ii) determine, on a cost-related basis or other economical and equitable basis (including any basis authorized under section 1861(v)), the amounts of payments to be made for part B services furnished by such providers and facilities to such individuals. Such regulations shall provide for the implementation of appropriate incentives for encouraging more efficient and effective delivery of services (consistent with quality care), and shall include, to the extent determined feasible by the Secretary, a system for classifying comparable providers and facilities, and prospectively set rates or target rates with arrangements for sharing such reductions in costs as may be attributable to more efficient and effective delivery of services.

"(C) Such regulations, in the case of services furnished by proprietary providers and facilities may include, if the Secretary finds it feasible and appropriate, provision for recognition of a reasonable rate of return on equity capital, providing such rate of return does not exceed the rate of return stipulated in section 1861(v)(1)(B).

"(D) For purposes of section 1878, a renal dialysis facility shall be treated as a provider of services.

"(3) With respect to payments for physicians' services furnished to individuals determined to have end-stage renal disease, the Secretary shall pay 80 percent of the amounts calculated for such services—

"(A) on a reasonable charge basis (but may, in such case, make payment on the basis of the prevailing charges of other physicians for comparable services) except that payment may not be made under this subparagraph for routine services furnished during a maintenance dialysis episode, or

"(B) on a comprehensive monthly fee or other basis for an aggregate of services provided over a period of time (as defined in regulations).

"(4) Pursuant to agreements with approved providers of services and renal dialysis facilities, the Secretary may make payment to such providers and facilities for the cost of home dialysis supplies and equipment and self-care home dialysis support services furnished to patients whose self-care home dialysis is under the direct supervision of such provider or facility, on the basis of a target reimbursement rate (as defined in paragraph (6)).

"(5) An agreement under paragraph (4) shall require that the provider or facility will—

"(A) assume full responsibility for directly obtaining or arranging for the provision of—

"(i) such medically necessary dialysis equipment as is prescribed by the attending physician;

"(ii) dialysis equipment maintenance and repair services;

"(iii) the purchase and delivery of all necessary medical supplies; and

"(iv) where necessary (as determined by the Secretary under regulations), the services of trained home dialysis aides;

"(B) perform all such administrative functions and maintain such information and records as the Secretary may require to verify the transactions and arrangements described in subparagraph (A);

"(C) submit such cost reports, data, and information as the Secretary may require with respect to the costs incurred for equipment, supplies, and services furnished to the facility's home dialysis patient population; and

"(D) provide for full access for the Secretary to all such records, data, and information as he may require to perform his functions under this section.

"(6) The Secretary shall establish, for calendar year, commencing with January 1, 1979, a target reimbursement rate for home dialysis which shall be adjusted for regional variations in the cost of providing home dialysis. In establishing such a rate, the Secretary shall include—

"(A) the Secretary's estimate of the cost of providing medically necessary home dialysis supplies and equipment;

"(B) an allowance, in an amount determined by the Secretary, to cover the cost of providing personnel to aid in home dialysis; and

"(C) an allowance, in an amount determined by the Secretary, to cover administrative costs and to provide an incentive for the efficient delivery of home dialysis;

but in no event shall such target rate exceed 70 percent of the national average payment, adjusted for regional variations, for maintenance dialysis services furnished in approved providers and facilities during the preceding fiscal year. Any such target rate so established shall be utilized, without renegotiation of the rate, throughout the calendar year for which it is established. During the last quarter of each calendar year, the Secretary shall establish a home dialysis target reimbursement rate for the next calendar year based on the most recent data available to the Secretary at the time. In establishing any rate under this paragraph, the Secretary may utilize a competitive bid procedure, a pre-negotiated rate procedure, or any other procedure which the Secretary determines is appropriate and feasible in order to carry out this paragraph in an effective and efficient manner.

"(7) For purposes of this title, the term 'home dialysis supplies and equipment' means medically necessary supplies and equipment (including supportive equipment) required by an individual suffering from end-stage renal disease in connection with renal dialysis carried out in his home (as defined in regulations), including obtaining, installing, and maintaining such equipment.

"(8) For purposes of this title, the term 'self-care home dialysis support services', to the extent permitted in regulation, means—

"(A) periodic monitoring of the patient's home adaptation, including visits by qualified provider or facility personnel (as defined in regulations), so long as this is done in accordance with a plan prepared and periodically reviewed by a professional team (as defined in regulations) including the individual's physician;

"(B) installation and maintenance of dialysis equipment;

"(C) testing and appropriate treatment of the water; and

"(D) such additional supportive services as the Secretary finds appropriate and desirable.

"(9) For purposes of this title, the term 'self-care dialysis unit' means a renal dialysis facility or a distinct part of such facility or of a provider of services, which has been approved by the Secretary to make self-dialysis services, as defined by the Secretary in regulations, available to individuals who have been trained for self-dialysis. A self-care dialysis unit must, at a minimum, furnish the services, equipment, and supplies needed for self-care dialysis, have patient-staff ratios which are appropriate to self-dialysis (allowing for such appropriate lesser degree of ongoing medical supervision and assistance of ancillary personnel than is required for full care maintenance dialysis), and meet such other requirements as the Secretary may prescribe with respect to the quality and cost-effectiveness of services.

"(c)(1)(A) For the purpose of assuring effective and efficient administration of the benefits provided under this section, the Secretary shall establish, in accordance with such criteria as he finds appropriate, renal disease network areas, such network organizations (including a coordinating council, an executive committee of such council, and a medical review board, for each network area) as he finds necessary to accomplish such purpose, and a national end stage renal disease medical information system. The Secretary may by regulations provide for such coordination of network planning and quality assurance activities and such exchange of data and information among agencies with responsibilities for health planning and quality assurance activities under Federal law as is consistent with the economical and efficient administration of this section and with the responsibilities established for network organization under this section.

"(B) At least one patient representative shall serve as a member of each coordinating council and executive committee.

"(C) No person—

"(i) with an ownership or control interest (as defined in section 1124(a)(3)) in a facility or provider which provides services referred to in section 1861(s)(2)(F) or provides kidney transplants, or

"(ii) who has received remuneration from any such facility or provider in excess of such amounts as constitute reasonable compensation for services or goods supplied to such facility or provider, or

"(iii) who is the spouse, parent, son, daughter, brother, or sister of a person described in clause (i) or (ii) (or who bears such relationship to the spouse of such a person), shall serve as a member of any network organization.

"(2) The network organizations of each network shall be responsible, in addition to such other duties and functions as may be prescribed by the Secretary, for—

"(A) encouraging, consistent with sound medical practice, the use of those treatment settings most compatible with the successful rehabilitation of the patient;

"(B) developing criteria and standards relating to the quality and appropriateness of patient care; and

"(C) evaluating the procedures by which facilities and providers in the network assess the appropriateness of patients for proposed treatment modalities.

"(d) Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in section 226, any individual who donates a kidney for transplant surgery shall be entitled to benefits under parts A and B of this title with respect to such donation. Reimbursement for the reasonable expenses incurred by such an individual with respect to a kidney donation shall be made (without regard to the deductible, premium, and coinsurance provisions of this title), in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary in regulations, for all reasonable preparatory, operation, and postoperation recovery expenses associated with such donation, including but not limited to the expenses for which payment could be made if he were an eligible individual for purposes of parts A and B of this title without regard to this subsection. Payments for post-operation recovery expenses shall be limited to the actual period of recovery.

"(e)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the Secretary may, pursuant to agreements with approved providers of services and renal dialysis facilities, reimburse such providers and facilities (without regard to the deductible and coinsurance provisions of this title) for the reasonable cost of the purchase, installation, maintenance and reconditioning for subsequent use of artificial kidney and automated dialysis peritoneal machines (including supportive equipment) which are to be used exclusively by entitled individuals dialyzing at home.

"(2) An agreement under this subsection shall require that the provider or facility will—

"(A) make the equipment available for use only by entitled individuals dialyzing at home;

"(B) recondition the equipment, as needed, for reuse by such individuals throughout the useful life of the equipment, including modification of the equipment consistent with advances in research and technology;

"(C) provide for full access for the Secretary to all records and information relating to the purchase, maintenance, and use of the equipment; and

"(D) submit such reports, data, and information as the Secretary may require with respect to the cost, management, and use of the equipment.

"(3) For purposes of this section, the term 'supportive equipment' includes blood pumps, heparin pumps, bubble detectors, other alarm systems, and such other items as the Secretary may determine are medically necessary.

"(f)(1) The Secretary shall initiate and carry out, at selected locations in the United States, pilot projects under which financial assistance in the purchase of new or used durable medical equipment for renal dialysis is provided to individuals suffering from end stage renal disease at the time home dialysis is begun, with provision for a trial period to assure successful adaptation to home dialysis before the actual purchase of such equipment.

"(2) The Secretary shall conduct experiments to evaluate methods for reducing the costs of the end stage renal disease program. Such experiments shall include (without being limited to) reimbursement for nurses and dialysis technicians to assist with home dialysis, and reimbursement to family members assisting with home dialysis.

"(3) The Secretary shall conduct experiments to evaluate methods of dietary control for reducing the costs of the end stage renal disease program, including (without being limited to) the use of protein-controlled products to delay the necessity for, or reduce the frequency of, dialysis in the treatment of end stage renal disease.

"(4) The Secretary shall conduct a comprehensive study of methods for increasing public participation in kidney donation and other organ donation programs.

"(5) The Secretary shall conduct a full and complete study of the remibursement of physicians for services furnished to patients with end stage renal disease under this title, giving particular attention to the range of payments to physicians for such services, the average amounts of such payments, and the number of hours devoted to furnishing such services to patients at home, in renal disease facilities, in hospitals, and elsewhere.

"(6) The Secretary shall conduct a study of the number of patients with end stage renal disease who are not eligible for benefits with respect to such disease under this title (by reason of this section or otherwise), and of the economic impact of such noneligibility of such individuals. Such study shall include consideration of mechanisms whereby governmental and other health plans might be instituted or modified to permit the purchase of actuarially sound coverage for the costs of end stage renal disease.

"(7) The Secretary shall conduct a study of the medical appropriateness and safety of cleaning and reusing dialysis filters by home dialysis patients. In such cases in which the Secretary determines that such home cleaning and reuse of filters is a medically sound procedure, the Secretary shall conduct experiments to evaluate such home cleaning and reuse as a method of reducing the costs of the end stage renal disease program.

"(8) The Secretary shall submit to the Congress no later than October 1, 1979, a full report on the experiments conducted under paragraphs (1), (2), (3), and (7) and the studies under paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7). Such report shall include any recommendations for legislative changes which the Secretary finds necessary or desirable as a result of such experiments and studies.

"(g) The Secretary shall submit to the Congress on October 1, 1978, and on October 1 of each year thereafter, a report on the end stage renal disease program, including but not limited to—

"(1) the number of patients nationally and by renal disease network, on dialysis (self-dialysis or otherwise) at home and in facilities;

"(2) the number of new patients entering dialysis at home and in facilities during the year;

"(3) the number of facilities providing dialysis and the utilization rates of those facilities;

"(4) the number of kidney transplants, by source of donor organ;

"(5) the number of patients awaiting organs for transplant;

"(6) the number of transplant failures;

"(7) the range of costs of kidney acquisitions, by type of facility and by region;

"(8) the number of facilities providing transplants and the number of transplants performed per facility;

"(9) patient mortality and morbidity rates;

"(10) the average annual cost of hospitalization for ancillary problems in dialysis and transplant patients, and drug costs for transplant patients;

"(11) medicare payment rates for dialysis, transplant procedures, and physician services, along with any changes in such rates during the year and the reasons for those changes;

"(12) the results of cost-saving experiments;

"(13) the results of basic kidney disease research conducted by the Federal Government, private institutions, and foreign governments;

"(14) information on the activities of medical review boards and other network organizations; and

"(15) estimated program costs over the next five years.".

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-714), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I. PURPOSE AND BACKGROUND OF THE BILL

During the past several years a number of studies and public hearings have been conducted in order to assess the operation and effectiveness of the medicare end stage renal disease program. The results of these efforts indicate that the program has been generally successful in meeting the needs of renal disease patients for protection against the catastrophic costs of dialysis and transportation. However, at the same time, it has become clear that the program is plagued by a number of serious problems which threaten to undermine its continuing stability and effectiveness.

The committee is concerned about the high and steadily rising cost of the program and the burden it can place on the medicare trust funds unless steps are taken to put it on a more cost-effective basis. The committee believes that there are several areas of potential cost savings, including the increased use of self-dialysis settings and tranplantation, where medically appropriate, and the use of incentive reimbursement methods to encourage economies in the delivery of services.

The introduction of appropriate incentives to encourage the medically appropriate use of lower cost treatment modalities is compatible with the best interests of renal disease patients. The patient who successfully undergoes transplantation can return to a relatively normal and stable life. The patient who can successfully manage self-dialysis either in his own home or in a self-care dialysis unit of a facility regains a significant measure of control over his own care and escapes from what might otherwise be a permanently dependent relationship. And in both types of cases, program savings over the long run can be substantial.

The committee wishes to stress its intent that patients who are medically, psychologically, and socially inappropriate for home dialysis are not to be forced, through administrative procedure, into home dialysis. Objective professional judgment, along with the needs and wishes of the patient, should be the principal determinants of the locus of treatment.

II. SUMMARY OF THE BILL

The medicare renal disease program amendments are designed to accomplish four objectives: Provide incentives for the use of lower cost, medically appropriate self-dialysis (particularly home dialysis), as an alternative to high-cost institutional dialysis; eliminate current program disincentives to the use of transplantation; provide for the implementation of incentive reimbursement methods to assure more cost-effective delivery of services to patients dialyzing in institutions and at home; and provide for studies of alternative ways to improve the program and for regular reporting to the Congress on the renal disease program. The summary presented below briefly outlines these principal features of the bill and, in addition, an unrelated medicare amendment which deals with payment for physicians' services in teaching hospitals.

INCENTIVES FOR USE OF SELF-DIALYSIS

Several provisions are designed to provide incentives for more extensive use of lower cost, medically appropriate self-care dialysis settings. Although the cost of treatment in self-dialysis settings is usually considerably less for the program than facility dialysis, there has been a steady decline in the percentage of patients on home dialysis. Experience indicates that one of the reasons for this decline is the existence of financial disincentives, resulting from the benefit structure of the medicare program, for patients to undertake self-dialysis. The bill modifies present law to eliminate these disincentives by:

1. Waving the present 3-month waiting period for a beneficiary who enters a self-care training program prior to the end of the third month after the month his regular course of dialysis begins;

2. Providing coverage for disposable supplies (such as syringes, needles, and sterile drapes) required for home dialysis;

3. Proving coverage for periodic supportive services, including emergency visits and servicing of dialysis equipment, furnished by facilities to individuals dialyzing at home; and

4. Authorizing full reimbursement to facilities for dialysis equipment purchased by facilities for the exclusive use of patients dialyzing at home.

The bill also provides coverage for services of a self-care dialysis unit maintained by a rental dialysis facility.

ELIMINATE DISINCENTIVES TO TRANSPLANTATION

Several provisions are designed to eliminate disincentives to transplantation which expose transplant candidates to significant financial risk. Thus, the bill provides for:

1. Coverage for a transplant patient beginning with the month he is hospitalized, without regard to the waiting period of present law, if transplant surgery takes place within that month or the following 2 months;

2. Extension of the period of post-transplantation medicare coverage from 12 months to 36 months;

3. Immediate resumption of coverage, without a waiting period, whenever a transplant fails; and

4. Coverage for expenses incurred by live kidney donors, including the period of the donor's recovery.

REIMBURSEMENT METHODS

To assure more cost-effective reimbursement for dialysis services the bill provides for use of incentive reimbursement methods for services furnished by renal dialysis facilities to patients dialyzing in the facility or at home. Such methods may include prospectively set rates, a system for classifying comparable facilities, the use of target rates (adjusted for regional differences) with provision for sharing savings attributable to efficient and effective delivery of services, and other incentives to efficient performance. (The Secretary may use competitive-bid procedures, prenegotiated rate procedures or such other procedures as he finds feasible and appropriate in establishing the home dialysis target rates.)

The bill also clarifies present law concerning the alternative reimbursement methods available to physicians with respect to services provided in connection with routine maintenance dialysis episodes.

STUDIES, REPORTS, AND ADMINISTRATION

The bill requires the Secretary to conduct experiments and studies on ways to reduce program costs, without impairing quality of care, including studies relating to reuse of dialysis filters and the use of dietary controls, to increase public participation in organ donation programs and to assess alternative ways of financing renal disease services. The bill also requires the Secretary to submit an annual report to the Congress on the cost and operation of the program, and on developments in basic and applied research in the field of renal disease. The Secretary is authorized to develop appropriate administrative structures and arrangements to carry out his responsibilities.

TEACHING PHYSICIANS

In a provision whose applicability is not limited to the ESRD portion of medicare, the bill defers the effective date of a previously enacted provision (sec. 227 of P.L. 92-603) which deals with reimbursement under medicare for the services of physicians in teaching hospitals.

MINOR AND TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

The bill amends the entitlement provisions of present law to clarify the intent that individuals with end stage renal disease are deemed to satisfy the requirements relating to disability beneficiaries. The bill also provides that the Administrator of the Health Care Financing Administration shall serve, in lieu of the Commissioner of Social Security, as the Secretary of the Board of Trustees of the Hospital Insurance and Supplementary Medical Insurance Trust Funds and shall be responsible for making reimbursement to HMO's under the medicare program.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

REIMBURSEMENT OF U.S. MARSHAL SERVICE

The resolution (S. Res. 428) to authorize reimbursement of U.S. Marshal Service for service of committee subpenas, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is authorized to pay out of funds appropriated to the Committee on the Judiciary, the sum of $1,777 to the United States Marshal for the District of Columbia as reimbursement for the mileage, witness fees, and expenses of five persons subpenaed by the committee, to testify at a hearing held by the committee on the nomination of Robert F. Collins to be a United States district court judge for the eastern district of Louisiana.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask uanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–725), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The resolution authorizes the Secretary of the Senate to pay from the funds allocated to the Committee on the Judiciary the sum of $1,777.00 to reimburse the U.S. Marshal for the District of Columbia for mileage, witness fees, and expenses of five persons subpenaed by the committee. In its consideration of the nomination of Robert F. Collins to be a U.S. district court judge for the Eastern District of Louisiana, the committee determined that it was necessary to subpena four persons from New Orleans, La., and one person from Baton Rouge, La., to testify on the nomination of Mr. Collins. The subpenas were issued by the committee and given to the U.S. Marshal for the District of Columbia for service by the marshal service, as authorized by section 569(b) of title 28, United States Code. The committee requested the marshal's service to disburse the necessary mileage and witness fees to the five persons at the time the subpenas were served and to reimburse them for lodging and other necessary expenses while attending the committee hearing which was held on March 3, 1978. While the five persons furnished written receipts to the marshal's service for these disbursements and expenses, the regulation of the Senate Finance Office would seem to require disbursement out of Senate funds direct to the witnesses involved. In order to avoid unnecessary paperwork and record-keeping, this resolution would authorize the disbursement directly to the U.S. Marshal as reimbursement for money expended at the request of the committee.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. I move to law that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, are there any orders for the recognition of Senators on tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are none, I am told.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Chair.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 11:30 tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP AND FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow morning, after the prayer, the two leaders have not to exceed 5 minutes each and that following that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each, the period not to extend beyond 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. At 12 o'clock tomorrow, the Senate would automatically resume its consideration of the treaty, would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And the pending question at that time would be on the adoption of the amendment by Mr. HELMS?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. There is a time agreement on that amendment of 1 hour, to be equally divided between and controlled by Mr. HELMS and Mr. CHURCH or their designees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

TIME FOR VOTE ON HELMS AMENDMENT TOMORROW

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in view of the commitments that a number of Senators have on our side tomorrow from 12 o'clock or approximately 12:30 until 2 o'clock, I wonder whether it might be possible to postpone the vote on the Helms amendment until, say, 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there are similar needs on this side of the aisle.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote in relation to the amendment by Mr. HELMS occur at 2 p.m. tomorrow; that if the time on that amendment expires or is yielded back prior to that time, there be consent given for setting that amendment temporarily aside and for the purpose of proceeding with other amendments or motions with relation to the treaty; that if votes are ordered on such, they may be placed back to back, if there is a time agreement on those motions or amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

PROGRAM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, this means, then, that barring a vote for the purpose of establishing a quorum tomorrow, there would be no rollcall vote between 12:30 p.m. and 2 p.m. tomorrow. At 2 p.m. there would be a vote on the Helms amendment and possibly backup votes on other amendments and/or motions which may have been processed by that time. During the afternoon there will be other rollcall votes.

I understand that Mr. HELMS has a number of amendments. So tomorrow afternoon may be designated as "Helms day." I say that in good humor and with the understanding that Mr. HELMS does have, I believe, about five or six amendments to the article. He is quite willing to proceed, as he indicated today, with those amendments and under time agreements as we move along from amendment to amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield to me, I observed that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina does have a number of amendments. In his usual and characteristic spirit of cooperation, he has agreed to time limitations on all of them—I might add relatively short time limitations—and that has had a good effect on the likelihood that we could conclude consideration of several amendments remaining to this treaty before the time the Senate rises from the Committee of the Whole and proceeds to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. That is in accordance with my understanding of the situation. Mr. HELMS is one of the most agreeable and cooperative of Senators.

Mr. LAXALT today indicated that consideration had been given earlier to the number of amendments that remain. He feels that, based on his information, the Senate will be able to take up each of the remaining amendments and allot a reasonable amount of time to them, and that Senators therefore will be able to have some discussion on those amendments before we rise from the Committee of the Whole at the close of business on Thursday.

So everything seems to be pretty well on schedule and on track.

RECESS UNTIL 11:30 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until 11:30 tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and at 8:05 p.m. the Senate, in executive session, recessed until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 11, 1978, at 11:30 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

FINANCIAL REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE LEGISLATION

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, there are today being placed in the amendments section of the RECORD replacement texts for parts A and B of title II of H.R. 1, the vehicle the House will use to consider the Ethics in Government Act.

The part A replacement text contains the language of title I of H.R. 6954 (part I), as reported by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service combined with title I of H.R. 6954 (part II), as reported by the Committe on Armed Services. Thus, this replacement text covers financial disclosure procedures for both executive branch civilian employees and uniformed personnel.

The part B replacement text contains the language of title II of H.R. 6954 (part I), as reported by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. This text creates the Office of Government Ethics at the Civil Service Commission.

I urge my colleagues to study these texts. Many of the differences between them and H.R. 1 are more form than substance. There are, however, five substantive differences in them which I believe are of tremendous importance.

First, reporting requirements are simplified. This was accomplished primarily by (a) making reporting of items which fall below the threshold or "di minimis" amounts discretionary and thereby eliminating the necessity that an individual determining precisely whether the threshold has been reached (if in doubt, the item may be reported), and (b) by providing less specificity with respect to the various categories within which reported items must be placed. The view here is that it is less important that an item be accurately categorized than it is that it be reported. And detailed categorization is unduly burdensome to the reporting individual. It should be remembered that executive branch reporting will apply to thousands of individuals, and accordingly, it is important that the reporting requirements be kept simple as possible.

Second, coverage in the Post Office and Civil Service Committee text has been expanded with respect to whom must report. It requires all politically appointed (so-called Schedule C positions) to file reports regardless of the grade of their position. Since these Schedule C positions are by definition "confidential or policymaking financial reporting for these individuals is particularly appropriate. The text also permits the Director of Government Ethics to require, by regulation, confidential financial reporting by individuals holding certain types of positions which are classified at GS–15 and below. This reporting would replace that now required under Executive Order 11222, and reflects the belief that legislation of this nature should be comprehensive and not just deal with part of the problem.

Third, and probably most important, in the Post Office and Civil Service version, with respect to the public availability of information filed by reporting individuals, for public disclosure is provided only when it is believed that the invasion of personal privacy which such disclosure necessarily entails is clearly justified in terms of enhancing public confidence in the integrity of the Government decisionmaking processes. Remember, there are thousands of executive branch civilians who will be required to file reports, and public disclosure of this very personal information is a great invasion of privacy. Accordingly, three different rules are provided concerning the public availability of reported information.

First, top-level officers and employees (for the most part Presidential appointees) and employees appointed to or holding essentially political positions (Schedule C and noncareer executive assignment positions) must publicly disclose all the information which is required to be reported. Second, upper-level career employees (GS–16 through GS–18, and comparable positions under other pay systems) generally are required to publicly disclose the nature of financial interests required to be reported, but the extent or amount of these interests will generally not be disclosed. Finally, lower-level career employees (GS–15 and below, and comparable positions under other pay systems) are not required to disclose any information required to be reported.

I believe this approach properly addresses the problem of requiring public disclosure only to the extent necessary to enable the public to make informed judgments as to whether the integrity of the Government decisionmaking processes is intact.

Fourth, in the text for part B, a pool of full-time ethics counselors (not to exceed 75 positions) is established. These ethics counselors will be appointed by and responsible to the Director of the Office of Government Ethics. It is essential that the individuals responsible for monitoring and administering the ethics program, the agency ethics officers, be accountable to one person, not to a myriad of different agency heads. I refer my colleagues to pages 74 and 75 of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service report on H.R. 6954 (H. Rept. 95–642, part I) for a nutshell discussion by the General Accounting Office of the merits of this approach.

Fifth and finally, the texts as it relates to civilian officers and employees and military officers, amend the appropriate provisions of codified law, specifically titles 5 and 10, United States Code, and is in keeping with the basic purpose of codification.●

BLACK WINS HONORS IN COAST GUARD

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues the proud accomplishment of the son of Mr. and Mrs. Manson Brown, Jr.

Twenty-one-year-old Manson K. Brown holds the high honor and great distinction of having been appointed to command the Cadet Brigade of the Coast Guard Academy. He is the first black ever to be so honored in the 101-year history of the Academy.

This is a position requiring elements of maturity that the young Brown has exhibited throughout his academic career.

It is with a great deal of pride that I share with you the following article which appeared in the Parents Association of Coast Guard Academy:

FIRST BLACK BRIGADE COMMANDER

The "third make" of the 1977–78 academic year is headed by Cadet, first class, Manson K. Brown, 21, of Washington, DC. He is the first black to command the Cadet Brigade in the 101 year history of the Academy.

Brown won appointment to this highest post of cadet leadership through outstanding achievement in academics, conduct, military bearing, and leadership, plus gaining the strong endorsement of the Academy's six "battalion officers." The position is a demanding one—not just a figurehead post. It requires tact, good judgment, administrative ability, hard work and—above all—dedication to the principles of honor, integrity and service for which the Academy stands.

The new Brigade Commander, a graduate of St. Johns College in the Nation's Capitol, accepted the challenge of his new position with the following comment: "This is the peak of my four years at the Academy. I'm going to give it everything I've got."

Brown is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Manson Brown, Jr., of 908 Farragut St., NW, Washington, DC. He is a civil engineering major who hopes to become a student engineer on the California based polar icebreaker GLACIER upon graduation. Before then he has a shot at a top "Honor Make" leadership position. The Honor Make is the final leadership structure of the Cadet Brigade. It is in effect during the final six weeks of the term and at graduation. It is comprised of outstanding performers within the four earlier makes. The other brigade officers of the third make are:

John F. Brooks, Brigade Executive Officer, son of Mr. and Mrs. Richard F. Brooks of Ballston Lake, NY; Michael J. Lapinski, Brigade Adjutant, son of Mr. and Mrs. Raymond J. Lapinski of Woodbury, CT; Kevin A. Nugent, Brigade Operations Officer, son of Mrs. Barbara A. Nugent of Amityville, NY; and William A. Emerson, Brigade Logistics Officer, son of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur D. Emerson of Georgetown, MA.●

TRIALS AT ALTON

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, last October, after a great deal of delay, the House approved legislation to provide for the reconstruction of lock and dam No. 26 along the Mississippi River at Alton, Ill. Nearly 5 months later, as a result of differences between the House and Senate on the specifics of a waterway user fee, this legislation remains stalled.

During this period, the structure at Alton has continued to deteriorate, traffic congestion has increased, midwestern grain has been slower to get to market and at greater cost, and energy supplies have been slower to reach the Midwest and at greater cost. The bottleneck at lock and dam No. 26, one of only two lock and dam systems along the Mississippi to handle traffic from both the upper Mississippi and the Illinois Rivers, has grown tighter.

As David Chenoweth, formerly with the Office of the Chief of Engineers, notes:

These important old locks, neither the largest nor the smallest, have continued to creak along, spouting water—perhaps in definance, or maybe out of frustration.

Following is the full text of his article on the "Trials at Alton" from Water Spectrum magazine:

TRIALS AT ALTON

(by David Chenoweth)

Situated below the junction of the Mississippi and Illinois Rivers, the locks at Alton, Illinois, are in almost constant operation. At times, they seem to take on an animated personality, creaking and groaning, leaking and sprouting water. Tows float passively in the river, waiting their turn to lock through. There is no outward fanfare or excitement to signal the extraordinary interest centered on this spot.

Locks and Dam 26 are presently surrounded by political and emotional controversy. While the legal battles have only recently begun, the Alton structures have been plagued with difficulties since their earliest days of construction 40 years ago.

This story describes not the current political debate over their future but their trouble-prone past. It tells of the trials the locks and dam have survived and how they were overcome.

Although we could start with 1938 when the locks first opened, or with 1934 when construction commenced the real story begins much earlier.

The rivers of North America were used by Indians for transportation before the rest of the world was aware the continent existed. In the early days of the United States, the rivers provided a way westward. Travel on the water in those days was uncertain, dependent upon the whims of nature for the proper flow—neither too much nor too little. As traffic increased, the fluctuating levels more often caused an interruption and the shippers began demanding flow regulation. The first Federal structures were wing dikes built in the 19th century that narrowed the river, creating a deeper channel.

The Mississippi, filled with water and traffic from its tributaries, quickly became a major water transportation route, carrying goods from all over the country. The river flows in a zig-zag pattern—now east, now west, but ever south to New Orleans and the Gulf. Its basin is the third largest in the world, reaching from within 250 miles of the Atlantic to within 500 miles of the Pacific. It extends from the Gulf of Mexico into Canada and takes in all or parts of 31 States and two Canadian Provinces. Its tributaries spread out like a web: the Ohio River and northeast, the Illinois to the Great Lakes, the Missouri to the west. Along the way, lesser rivers with exotic names of Yazoo and Ouachita and more common names of Arkansas, Red and White add to the flow.

WHY A DAM?

Navigation improvements came gradually on the upper Mississippi River. Channels were deepened as traffic grew: 4½ feet in 1878; then 6 feet in 1907; and in 1930, a 9-foot channel, but only from the mouth of the Illinois River to Minneapolis. The early, shallower channels were maintained primarily by dredging and dikes, but the present 9-foot channel could be obtained only by a series of slack-water pools created by a staircase of locks and dams.

The earliest mention of a dam in the Alton area was in a 1905 report on the possibilities of a waterway using the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers to connect the Great Lakes with the Gulf of Mexico. Later studies found that a lock in this area would benefit navigation on both rivers. Eventual construction of the locks and dam at Alton on the Mississippi raised the level of the Illinois and allowed the removal of two outdated and undersized locks dating back to 1890.

Work on L&D 26 began during the Depression years with funds provided under the National Recovery Act. The locks and dam became an authorized part of the Mississippi River waterway 2 years later when the River and Harbor Act of 1935 extended the lower limit to the Missouri River and included the completion of L&D 26 as part of that waterway.

The project was scheduled to be constructed in three stages, each starting with the building of a water-tight cofferdam around the work area. The first stage was the two locks and a short section of the dam on the Illinois side. The second, which started shortly after the first, was the portion of the dam on the Missouri side. The final stage would have been construction of the segment of the dam connecting the previously completed sections.

In February 1936, the cofferdam around the construction area on the Illinois shore was damaged by ice and failed, burying the steel framework under 18 feet of silt and mud. Following this failure, the contractor could not continue, his contract was cancelled, and the debris was later removed by the Federal Government.

The construction schedule had to be reworked. The project would move progressively across the river from the Missouri shore to the intact main lock of the Illinois shore. The auxiliary lock would have to be constructed inside the final cofferdam.

Among the worst of the construction problems to be overcome was the scouring of the river bed which occurred during the building of each cofferdam. Hydraulic dredges in the river upstream of the work areas pumped sand into the flowing water to replace the lost material. In effect much of the foundation under the locks and dam was placed on dredged fill. Erection of the final cofferdam was particularly difficult. This cofferdam enclosed the area where the first cofferdam failed, and the closure had to block off the main flow of the river—about three-fourths of the total flow. At one point, even with three dredges working, the bottom was eroded to a depth of 25 feet.

Problems continued. After closure, the final cofferdam was over-topped twice by floods, damaging equipment and slowing progress. Then, as the auxiliary lock was nearing completion in the last stage of construction, a large flow of water blew out from underneath the wall between the two locks. The flow was stopped only by driving sheet piling into the foundation and by extensive grouting.

The river had one more surprise to spring. Throughout the construction, water levels remained higher than normal. When removal of the final cofferdam began, the river unexpectedly fell, leaving shallows around the work area. Channels had to be dredged to bring floating equipment close enough to dismantle the cofferdam.

AN UNCERTAIN STRUCTURE

The completed locks and dam are built upon wooden piles driven into the river. The piles are about 35 feet long, while the sand bed in this area of the river is about 80 feet thick over bedrock. The stability of the foundation is dependent upon strong friction resistance between the piles and the sand surrounding them. Because of the scouring and filling during construction, the foundation materials under much of the dam and the small lock are weaker than when originally tested before construction.

Because of this weak foundation, the dam has shifted downstream and settled. Surveys indicate that the dam may have moved as much as 2 inches. All three lock walls have moved varying distances toward the river. The outside wall, built in the area where the first cofferdam failed, has shifted the most—about 10 inches.

As the result of these differential movements, the structure has experienced cracking and joint separation. Water cutoffs between adjoining sections are no longer intact. The resulting leakage has led to erosion, causing voids to develop around the supporting piles. Other holes developed as unconsolidated material settled, resulting in more settling, cracking and leaking, which, in turn, could lead to the development of more voids.

Correction of the structural inadequacies has been a continuing task. In 1938, shortly after the locks opened, extensive water inflows were discovered along the length of the main lock. Voids 5 feet deep had to be filled to stop the flow. Seepage occurred several times through a vertical joint near the Missouri shore and was not permanently stopped until 1947.

More voids were filled in 1954 and 1970. A stabilizing stone berm was constructed in 1970 in an attempt to halt the outward movement of the auxiliary lock river wall. Also in 1970, because of the possibility that the power cables under the locks could be sheared by the movements, an overhead cable frame was erected to insure reliable power for lock operation.

Scour holes have formed in the river bed downstream of the dam: The largest hole is relocated in line with the three roller gates in the middle of the dam. This hole, about 270 feet downstream of the spillway, goes deeper than the tips of the piles supporting the dam. Borings taken in this area show that the river bed, at some time in the past, has been scoured to bedrock; but it is not possible to determine whether the bed eroded before or after the dam's construction. Smaller scour holes are present in spots along the full length of the dam.

OLD LOCKS AND LOTS OF TRAFFIC

To a casual observer, the navigation facilities on the Mississippi River at Alton appear little different from many others to be found throughout the country. The gated spillway is about one-third of a mile long, reaching from the bank on the Missouri side to the locks on the Illinois shore. Both locks are 110 feet wide, the width of most locks in operation today. The main lock is only 600 feet long, standard for its day but half the length of modern structures. The auxiliary lock is shorter, only 360 feet long.

The locks are neither the largest nor the smallest in operation. They are, however, in a critical stretch of the river, where in less than 250 miles, four major navigable rivers come together. In this stretch, the upper Mississippi, the Illinois, the Missouri and the Ohio merge to form the giant lower Mississippi. All upbound traffic from the lower Mississippi, the Ohio and the Missouri and all downbound traffic from the Illinois and upper Mississippi must move through the locks. There is no alternative water route. The volume of traffic at Alton today is such that the locks are in constant operation, except for emergency shutdown.

Traffic through the locks grew from 1.4 million tons in 1938 to nearly 58 million tons in 1976. During the 10 years between 1966 and 1976, traffic increased over 70 percent, and jams and resultant delays at Alton are now common. In October 1975, one of the busiest months ever, the average delay was 21 hours for tows waiting to lock. During 1975 11 percent of the 5,000 tows that used the main lock waited longer than 20 hours and 1.5 percent waited more than 40 hours. In 1976, the average waiting time for tows using the main lock was over 11 hours.

The location complicates the traffic situation. The Illinois shore bulges into the river just above the locks, obstructing the channel and preventing a straight entry by tows. Before entering, the tows must move out into the river, come back across the current, and then line up for entry into a lock. During high waters, downbound tows entering the locks must overcome a current which cuts across the approach path to the locks. This outdraft makes maneuvering for entry from this direction difficult and increases the possibility for accidents.

A NEW STRUCTURE?

It became apparent in the 1960s that the amount of traffic that could be carried without delay would soon be surpassed and that long delays would result. The dam's physical stability was studied to determine if a new lock could be built through the dam to increase capacity. Analysis showed that the dam was grossly underdesigned by today's standards. Calculations performed to evaluate the stability of the dam had a startling result: the dam had already moved more than thought possible without causing damage to the timber piles.

An actual movement which exceeds design parameters means that either the foundation was weaker than the borings and pile tests indicated or that some factor which could not be included in the analysis, such as vibrations from periodic ice-passing operations, had an effect on the foundation and contributed to the movements. The conclusion was that a weak foundation condition existed and that additional construction in the area of the dam was extremely risky. Based on these results and the limited capacity of the locks, replacement facilities for L&D 26 were proposed in 1968.

The site chosen for the replacement was 2 miles downstream of the present dam. The new structure was to have two locks, each 110 by 1,200 feet—twice the length of the main lock at Alton. The dam was designed with a spillway of nine tainer gates, each 110 feet wide. Two of the gates were to be located between the locks to provide greater ease in simultaneous locking.

Congress provided funding for both design and construction, but lawsuits filed on August 6, 1974 stopped progress on the replacement project. The suits charged that an inadequate environmental analysis had been prepared, that the project could cause economic damages to railroads, and that the project was not properly authorized by Congress. Since then, the environmental analysis has been supplemented, and recommendation for a modified project with only a single lock has been submitted to Congress for authorization. Lacking Congressional action, the DOT and the Army Corps of Engineers are currently cooperating in an 18-month Field Test and Investigation Program to try to determine if there is any conceivable way to rehabilitate L&D 26, without recourse to total replacement, which is engineeringly feasible, safe, and cost effective.

COPING—A TWO-SIDED PROBLEM

In the 3 years since the lawsuit, steps have been taken to ensure the continuing safety of the dam and the smooth processing of the constantly growing traffic.

Although the weakened foundation could not be inspected, detailed studies performed in the late 1960s revealed major structural weaknesses. Of the damages found at that time, the most critical repairs were made in 1970; however, further repairs are now necessary.

Structural problems have been broken into two categories: those needing immediate attention and those requiring more study before repairs are started. Work has begun on both the immediate repairs and the additional studies.

An inspection made as part of the additional studies revealed a hole 300 feet long and as much as 10 feet deep under the downstream end of the wall between the locks. A diver investigating the hole said that the supporting piles were so exposed that it was like walking in a forest.

Filling this hole received priority attention, even though it was not originally scheduled in the first phase of repairs. Both locks were closed for about 10 hours a day during the first part of work and for two 10-hour days near the end of the 3-month job that began in February 1977. The navigation industry was given advance warnings but the closings, of course, jammed up the river traffic.

Other work still to be done includes stabilizing the big scour hole downstream of the dam and repairing holes in gate bay sills and in the stilling basin. An estimated 3 years will be needed for designing and performing these repairs.

When completed, the repair work will not bring the integrity of the dam up to current standards, but it will reduce the chance of failure. This system of repairs is thought adequate for the next 10 years, but no one seems willing to predict the situation a decade hence.

The other side of the present problem at Alton is the delay caused by the undersized facilities. Tows in 1938 were much smaller than today, and the main lock and guidewalls were built to carry traffic this size.

Tows approaching or leaving a lock use the guidewalls for alignment, usually by rubbing or bumping against them. The guidewalls at L&D 26 were originally 600 feet long, corresponding to the length of the existing traffic.

The main lock can hold, at the most, either nine standard barges or eight barges and a towboat. Since 1938, towboats have gotten more powerful and barges have been improved in size and shape. With these improvements most tows on the river are now made up of more than nine barges. To get through a 600-foot lock, large tows must be broken into two segments that can each fit in the lock. To begin a lockage, the tow moves into the chamber, the front half is disconnected; and the second half backs away, leaving the first section in the lock. After locking, this section is pulled from the lock, usually by an electric winch located on the lock-wall, and the barges are secured to the guidewall. The second section is then locked through; the two parts of the tows are reconnected; and the tow proceeds on up or down the river.

In October 1976, new procedures were put into effect at L&D 26 that changed the handling of double lockages. The basic objective is to speed processing by reducing the time a lock is dedicated to a specific tow.

Previously, the tows were allowed to remake into the river configuration while blocking the lock chamber. The electric winches pulled the first section far enough along the guidewall for the lock gate to close, but not far enough for the second section to fully clear the chamber while the two sections were being reconnected.

The new procedures require that tows be remade in a position that does not obstruct the lock for subsequent operation. To make this possible, the guidewalls at Alton had to be at least 1,200 feet long, and some means other than the existing winches had to be used to move the first section from the lock.

The upper guidewall was extended in 1976 with three Government-owned DeLong Piers, which are floating platforms sometimes used in salvage work. (Timber piles installed in the 1950s give the lower guidewall an effective length of 1,200 feet.) A helper boat or suiter boat now removes the first section of a double lockage and places it near the end of the guidewall, holding it there until the second section has completed locking and the tow has been remade. During the remaking of the tow, both sections are completely out of the chambers, which frees the lock and allows the next tow in line to begin locking. The helper boats are faster than the winches and can aid in the remaking of the two sections. These boats are not Government-owned but are provided by the navigation industry.

Traffic analysis showed that about every fourth tow that uses the locks at Alton is a configuration that needs little or no rearranging to fit into the chamber and can transit the lock in a single operation. To take advantage of this traffic problem, tows are now processed in sequences of four in each direction. The process is called "four up—four down," meaning that four upbound tows are locked sequentially, then four downbound, then four upbound, and so on. Whenever possible, a single lockage tow is scheduled last in a sequence. Because a tow of this type does not need the guidewall for reconnecting barges, this schedule allows the first tow in the next sequence to move into the lock area from the opposite direction and start preparing for lockage while the preceding tow is still in the chamber.

The use of longer guidewalls, the helper boats and the scheduling is creating a much smoother traffic flow through the locks. Preliminary results show that the time required for a double lockage may be reduced by as much as 30 minutes a tow.

The future of these locks on the Mississippi River at Alton is clouded. The repairs and operational improvements will not solve the problems. Major repairs will be needed again, but the expensive maintenance will not make the locks and dam structurally sound by present day standards. Operational improvements will not end the delays; they will only allow the locks to partially keep up with increasing traffic. The ultimate answer will have to come from Congress.

Until that time, man will keep struggling with the difficulties. These important old locks, neither the largest nor the smallest, will continue to creak along, spouting water—perhaps in defiance, or maybe out of frustration.●

LABOR LAW DISASTER

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the so-called labor law reform bill has passed the House and is awaiting action in the Senate. Passage of this legislation would be a serious mistake. The bill takes only a union leadership point of view while ignoring the legitimate concerns of employers and employees.

Government Executive recently called the bill "a disaster area looking for a place to happen." The impact on small business would be especially devasting.

To those who say, "We can work out something sensible later in Committee conference," Government Executive responds: "Ever try reasoning with a steamroller?"

The labor law bill is a bad piece of legislation. It should be rejected by the Senate.

Following is the full text of the article from the March issue of Government Executive:

PUBLISHERS NOTE

We'd like to talk here, this time, about something that has nothing directly to do with this month's editorial content. We mention it because a vote comes up in the Senate in about two weeks—and just the idea of S. 2467 scares us.

Common language for that is the "Labor Reform Bill." It's the most sweeping legislation since the Wagner Act more than 40 years ago, and organized labor union bosses are pushing it for the same reason: to reverse a trend of falling union memberships (currently down to about one in every five U.S. workers.)

Senator Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) calls it "the most anti-small business Bill ever brought before Congress." And this operation called Government Executive is a small business. S. 2467 is a disaster area looking for a place to happen.

Labor advocates make much noise about Big Business having the whip hand in management-labor negotiations. That's a phoney. Three-fourths of the "union-or-not" elections held last year were in companies with 50 employees or less. And union organizers lost more than half the votes.

The Bill, if passed, would, in effect, require our little operation to pay the cost of union organizers coming in the shop here to urge unionization. Unionizing or not is up to the employees, but small businesses having to pay for it could means, for thousands, of us, the employees ending up with no company to be unionized in.

The Bill would "stack" the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) with two more member—at an estimated 50 percent increase in the Board's $88 million annual budget. And the new rules guarantee the bankrupting of every Mom-and-Pop store in the Nation any time Dad Doesn't do what a union-member-employee wants. Essentially, the NLRB will be stacked to give Labor an unbalanced, irrefutable, decisive authority over management decision-making.

Big business has, in fact, shown not all that much concern, on the theory that most of them already are unionized. Besides, they rationalize. "We can work out something sensible later in Committee conference." Ever try reasoning with a steam-roller?

Within 10 years after the Wagner Act passed, union memberships jumped from two million up to 14 million persons. S. 2467 would require "quickie" election procedures in, among others, small businesses (which account for 95 percent of all U.S. businesses and just over half the Gross National Product.)

Reasons, said one Big Labor leader: "If we can get an election held within two weeks, we'll win a vote to unionize; if it takes longer, we'll lose." In other words, the more employees find out, the less interested they are in the subject. Let us pray the Senate moves just as carefully, on S. 2467, as workers do. Otherwise, free economic choice will be smacked with one more, possibly devastating, punch.●

CANAL TREATIES: VIEWS OF THE NATIONAL BLACK SILENT MAJORITY

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, one of the angles in the current debate on the Panama Canal treaties is the viewpoint of black people of both Panama and the United States. Reliable information on this aspect was provided on February 15, 1978, at the Army and Navy Club of Washington in a notable address before the District of Columbia Chapter of the U.S. Naval Academy Alumni Association by Clay J. Claiborne, national director of the National Black Silent Majority Committee of Washington, D.C., and San Antonio, Tex.

That address was made subsequent to an informal visit by Mr. Claiborne to the Isthmus during which he had the opportunity of gaining firsthand information from Panamanians and Zonians of all classes and colors.

Mr. Claiborne's address touched on many vital points about the situation in the zone and Panama. Among these were:

1. That Mr. Claiborne was interested not so much in saving the Panama Canal but in saving the United States.

2. That most Panamanians understand the situation presented by the projected treaties and hope that the United States will stay on the isthmus.

3. That the danger of U.S.S.R. penetration of the isthmus is a real one.

4. That many Panamanians live in fear with no protection of their rights.

5. That there has been an active anti-North American propaganda campaign in Panama.

After his address, Mr. Claiborne received a rousing ovation from this distinguished audience which included representatives of the Manion Forum. These latter members of the audience subsequently invited Mr. Claiborne to speak over the Manion Forum Network. This he did on March 26.

Mr. Speaker, because the Manion Forum broadcast by Mr. Claiborne summarizes the major points of the February address, I quote it as part of my remarks today and urge that it be read by all Members of the Congress.

PANAMANIAN PEOPLE PREFER U.S. CONTROL OF CANAL

OFF-THE-RECORD INTERVIEWS REVEAL FEAR OF UNRESTRAINED TORRIJOS DICTATORSHIP

(By Mr. Clay J. Claiborne, National Director, National Black Silent Majority Committee)

Dean MANION. Today our friend Captain Frank Manson, Foreign Relations Counselor of the American Legion, is bringing Mr. Clay Claiborne to our microphone. I told you about this gentleman last year (Footnote No. 1294) after his patriotic "Black Silent Majority," so-called, was given an award of distinction by Freedoms Foundation at Valley Forge.

A few weeks ago, Mr. Claiborne addressed the United States Naval Academy Alumni Association in Washington and Captain Manson was there. I have asked them to talk to our radio audience about the substance of Mr. Claiborne's remarkable speech.

Now here is Captain Manson.

Capt. MANSON. Mr. Clay Claiborne, welcome to the Dean Manion Forum.

The purpose of this interview is to bring to the Manion Forum audience the salient points that you made representing the Black Silent Majority in America. Among other things in your speech to the Naval Academy Alumni Association you said that the most important thing in this country is self-preservation. Is that what the Black Silent Majority is all about?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Yes. We are dedicated, as I told the audience here, not just to save the Panama Canal, we came to appeal this to the Alumni Association to join us in helping to save America, and if the first step in that direction is the retention of the Panama Canal, we approve that.

We have been to Panama. We have talked to Panamanians. We took a group of five people down there. We called it a working task force. To be very honest about it, we went with open minds and unannounced—incognito. We walked through the market places. Let me insert here that we dressed ourselves down so that we didn't look too American.

Capt. MANSON. How do you do that?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Well, you take off your necktie and your white shirt and you get yourself some old clothes that you could lie around on the sidewalks with if you wanted to. You let your kinky hair become a little bit kinkier and you simply walk the streets. You talk to the merchants. You go into the market places and sit in public squares. And, you read signs.

All over Panama, back in the areas where the masses of people live, they have put up "Down with imperialism. Vote 'Si' for ratification." All signs and slogans, of course, in Spanish.

One reporter said to me, you don't speak Spanish. That is true, but my son is Phi Beta Kappa from Rutgers University in romance languages. He is fluent in French, Spanish, Italian and he speaks a good bit of German and Russian. He tampers with Arabic and speaks Hebrew. My wife is of Mexican-American extraction. She speaks Spanish probably much better than the average person who is taught Spanish in the schools.

Capt. MANSON. So, you were able to speak to them in Spanish.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. We were and we feel that we are qualified to say this truth which we found in Panama. The Panamanians, the rank and file, do not want America out of Panama. They do not want America to turn the Canal over to General Torrijos.

Their reasons are plain. He is a dictator. A dictatorship is a military machine which suppresses the people. With American influences out, they will be totally under his rule. They have been under his rule since 1959 when he took over the government by force.

The Panamanian status today, despite the fact that the American dollar is available to them and the economy of the country comes from the existence of the Canal, the Panamanian today would be a tragic figure in the maelstrom of despair if we were out. They feel that they have a kind of decent big brother to turn to.

Capt. MANSON. Did they tell you in so many words that they wanted America to stay there? Is that the way they put it to you?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. They put it bluntly to us. "We cannot exist as free people under this type of government. America is the only hope for the salvation of the people of Panama."

One very interesting conversation we had was with a Panamanian who holds a degree from Harvard University. He said this to me, "This whole thing is only a question of your President trying to do something that he thinks will help the American image. The correct image is for America to stay here, resurrect the people of Panama, not get them deeper under the heel of Torrijos who is doing business with Cuba."

Few people know this fact and it is a true condition, that there is a treaty which was signed between Cuba, Panama and the Soviet Union.

Capt. MANSON. Do you known the provisions of that treaty?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. I am familiar with the provisions to the extent that the Soviets will have a submarine base on the west coast of Panama. They have a right to open stores. The Cubans have a right to send so-called "advisors" into Panama—and they are doing this anyway.

Capt. MANSON. What about banks?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. The treaty they signed provides for a Soviet bank in Panama City. Of course, when you get to that city you will observe banks of many other nations there as well.

I pay a lot of attention to the fact that Panama is head over heels in debt, and that the principal negotiator who served six months representing the United States was a former officer of a bank that holds the major obligation or debt from Panama.

Capt. MANSON. You are talking about the Marine Midland Bank?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. You said that.

Capt. MANSON. Concerning this treaty—did you find this out from Panamanians?

MEDIA IGNORES RED TREATY

Mr. CLAIBORNE. No. I heard about it and I went to the record. Upon returning home, I went to see and received the help of friends on Capitol Hill in the House of Representatives. They had staff members go to the Library of Congress to research it for me. It is all there in black and white. For some unexplained reason, the news media saw little concern and gave little coverage to it.

Capt. MANSON. Mr. Claiborne, do you tie in this recent arrival in Cuba of more Soviet pilots to the Panamanian situation? Do you think there is any possible connection there? In just the last few days we have heard that there are additional pilots coming into Cuba and that they are relieving Cuban pilots who are going to Angola. Do you think there is any possibility that this has some ramifications in the Caribbean—especially Panama?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. The whole history of Castro's activities in the Caribbean—as far away as Argentina—since he came to power is an illustration to me to be a history of attempts and experiments which the Soviet Union is running via Castro to take over the whole western hemisphere.

I am certain that if you would take and read and consider the great many things that are happening to America all across the earth—Korea, Viet Nam and now Africa—that it is ridiculous for us to think that we are safe. The Russians put missile pads in Cuba in 1961 and 1962 ninety miles from America and today we see Castro sending 16 to 20 thousand men five thousand miles away to participate in battle in Angola and Ethiopia.

I think the Russians are trying to do this: they are trying to make pretty darn sure that they are going to be ready to take this nation apart by psychological warfare, by propagandizing multitudes of people within the structure of our own country. We have been propagandized into this Panama Canal situation.

There is no question in my mind when I look at the research that has been made available to us in our office out of the Library of Congress, which is also available to the President and the Congress, that research indicates the Communists are propagandizing all of South America, Central America and our own people into believing what a nasty thing it is that we want to retain that Canal. Meanwhile, the Panamanian people pray to God that America stays in and never gets out.

Capt. MANSON. Mr. Claiborne, are there many of your Silent Black Majority in communication with Senators on this subject?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. We have made it a point to bring back from Panama Torrijos' literature to his own people in which he refers to the American as the Gringo who has been humiliated, who has been scared out of Panama. He illustrates in this propaganda, which he circulated among Panamanians prior to the plebiscite there, that the Canal would be open at a time of international conflict, war, to all ships on an equal basis.

When he is in America he indulges in doubletalk by saying that we have a right to defend the Canal and that our ships will be given priority to move to the head of the line. The interesting thing is that he refuses to have a plebiscite to amend the treaty giving us a guarantee in writing.

We have to reason that Torrijos has no more intention of extending considerations provided in those treaties to America than the Soviet Union had in relation to the Berlin Blockade. These are significant things that have happened. We had an agreement. We let Russia march its troops into Berlin and did we pay the price for that.

Capt. MANSON. You are so right on that. I think that the message that you are bringing across is so important and I want to ask you, as the leader of the Black Silent Majority, if you are going to continue to make efforts to reach the Senators with the story that you are giving us today?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. We have had a great many supporters, both black and white, send the information which we put out to all the members of the Senate and House of Representatives. Congressman Eldon Rudd, of Arizona, presented it to the Foreign Relations Committee during hearings. All of our material is included in the Congressional Record. It is there for anyone to see.

PANAMANIANS LIVE IN FEAR

Capt. MANSON. It is quite apparent that you have a tremendous opportunity and a tremendous mission for the Black Silent Majority to get across to the Senators your knowledge and your conviction and I am hopeful that the Manion Forum can be used to do this.

Getting back for just a moment to the specifics that you obtained in Panama, are there any other evidences of dictatorship or control of the Panamanian people that you would like to tell this audience? What is the dictatorship like and how do they control the people?

Mr. CLAIBORNE. The most significant condition was that although we talked to a great many Panamanians they refused to let us quote them.

We had the unusual experience of talking to a Panamanian attorney who was for the treaty. He wants America out. This individual made it very vocal that he wanted us out. He said we should never have been there in the first place. He called Panama a country divided against itself. After we listened to him for about two hours, we said to him, "Counselor, can we quote you?" He said, "Oh, my God, no, no. We are talking off the record."

Now, this is an interesting study in human fear. Here is a man who is endorsing the dictatorship and the treaties, but he is so fearful of his life in Panama that he won't even let you quote him when he approves what the dictator is doing. There are all types of oppression against the people of Panama by Panamanians, that is, the Torrijos regime.

I heard President Carter say a thing on his last appeal, Fireside Chat, when he said that the Panamanians are going to have an election in August of 1978. I felt like asking him, if I could have, why didn't they have elections prior to negotiating the treaties, and why not an election before ratification of the treaties?

Capt. MANSON. Those are very good questions.

Your conclusion, after spending many, many hours and talking to many, many people is that, by and large, the Panamanians are hoping that the United States will retain the Panama Canal.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Yes, and in the final analysis let me say that the future of America is at stake. Americans have got to begin to question the cost of the world image of America.

We have given of our goods, our lives, our blood, our money, our technology to many nations across the face of the earth. Instead of an image of being good, we hear the cry, Yankee go home. We see Communism flooding across the globe like a plague.

Let us not forget that World War II was to be a war that would be concluded only by unconditional surrender. Well, we won the war but we lost the victory.

The Japanese and the Germans are enjoying the highest economy known to mankind while here in America our people are unemployed, inflation has taken over. Japanese goods have flooded the market so much so that it is hard to find a radio or color TV that has on it, made in the U.S.A. American dollars are going out of this country like snowflakes disappearing on an August day.

We have to stop and wonder and take counsel with ourselves. The stakes are high—the preservation of America. We inherited from our Forefathers a great nation and I think we owe it to future generations to make the sacrifices to keep it that way. I pray that God will help us to protect, preserve and make this nation what it has always been—the champion of liberties in the world.

Verity, justice and democracy to me are very important fundamental principles. We have been the leaders in that direction, and I pray that we will continue to be the leaders in that direction.

Capt. MANSON. Mr. Claiborne, you have given a most inspirational message here today and the Manion Forum is most appreciative. Thank you very much.

DEAN MANION. Thank you, Captain Manson, for bringing this distinguished patriot to our microphone.

My friends, if you wish to hear more about Mr. Claiborne's Black Silent Majority send for Manion Forum Footnote No. 1294.●

THE FIGHT TO SAVE SHEEPSHEAD BAY

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I recently introduced legislation, H.R. 11943, that authorizes the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers to dredge the famous and historic New York City waterway, Sheepshead Bay.

Sheepshead Bay has long been known as a mecca for good seafood restaurants, commercial, and sport fishing boats, and excellent buys on seafood. Around the turn of the century, a section of southern Brooklyn including Coney Island, Manhattan Beach, Brighton Beach, and Sheepshead Bay came into prominence as a flourishing resort area. People flocked to Sheepshead Bay to go fishing, and an entire fishing industry sprang up around the bay. Large docks were erected to accomodate a large sport and commercial fishing fleet. Fish markets opened on the banks of Sheepshead Bay that rivaled any in the country for quality, variety, and cost.

Though southern Brooklyn has changed dramatically, Sheepshead Bay and its fishing industry has remained a uniquely charming oasis in an otherwise urban setting. Year after year, the fishing in and around Sheepshead Bay has remained excellent. Even today, one is likely to find the community of Sheepshead Bay jam-packed on a weekend morning with fishermen, shoppers, and hungry seafood addicts.

Unfortunately, the future of Sheepshead Bay and its fishing industry is now endangered. Sheepshead Bay is slowly but inexorably being filled in by runoff silt, debris, and sewage coming from local pollutant sources. The bay is becoming shallow—so shallow, in fact, that Sheepshead Bay fishermen with relatively small boats complain that they are now unable to enter or navigate the bay at low tide. Unless some action is taken soon to deepen Sheepshead Bay, its fishermen will be forced to leave its waters. Without its fishermen, the Sheepshead Bay fishing industry will collapse and one of New York City's major attractions will be lost forever.

I have introduced this legislation in an effort to insure that this picturesque Brooklyn landmark will not disappear. If my efforts are successful, Sheepshead Bay and its fishing industry can be assured of survival and a healthy future.●

MR. RICHARD V. SZELIGOWSKI

HON. RONALD A. SARASIN

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. SARASIN. Mr. Speaker, in a world plagued by problems of global injustice, economic deprivation, chronic hunger, malnutrition, and shortages of basic housing and health care facilities, I find hope and encouragement in the work of many individuals who channel their compassion into positive action through service to the world community. The many volunteers who overcome the limitations of self-interest to give of themselves freely and offer some relief to the victims of injustice are indeed the hope of tomorrow's world.

It is with great pride and appreciation, then, that I would like to recognize the service of Mr. Richard V. Szeligowski from Bethany, Conn.—one such individual who has made invaluable contributions to the people of Botswana through his service in the Peace Corps.

The son of Mr. and Mrs. Vincent Szeligowski of 34 Carmel Road in Bethany, Mr. Szeligowski graduated from The Citadel in Charlestown, S.C., in 1966 with a degree in history. He has spent the past 2 years sharing his skills and knowledge by teaching development studies at Moeng College, a secondary boarding school in the Tswapong Hills of Botswana. Located in an isolated area about 5 miles from the nearest village and 50 miles from the nearest town in this southern Africa country, the college is the oldest secondary school in Botswana, constructed by the Bamanwoto tribe as an alternative to the school system in apartheid South Africa. Through his work in the school system, he was not only able to enrichen the lives of the students with whom he came in contact, but was also able to give guidance and support to fellow teachers, strengthening their educational skills, and furthering the development of the national educational structure.

It is indisputable that education is the major stepping stone which we must ford if we are ever to achieve a world in which all can live in security and dignity, for the wealth and potential of a nation can only be measured by the education of its people. Experiences such as that of Mr. Szeligowski transcend any single tangible contribution to the development of specific skills and fulfillment of particular needs of any one nation to foster an aura of international understanding and cooperation in which all can live and work toward the attainment of peace. We are proud to have Mr. Szeligowski as a member of our community in Bethany; we thank him for the hope he personifies and applaud him for his very commendable efforts.●

ROBERT D. GOSS, JR., "A MAN WHO SERVES"

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, on May 6 Legionnaires of the 33d District of Pennsylvania will gather in White Oak, Pa., for their annual post commanders dinner. The honored guest at this year's testimonial will be Mr. Robert D. Goss, Jr., an individual who has been active in Legion activities almost from the day he joined the organization more than 32 years ago.

Bob Goss' record in the Legion reads like a travelog: Joined Turtle Creek Post 640 in April 1946; elected sergeant-at-arms in 1947; junior vice commander in 1948; senior vice commander in 1949, and post commander in 1950. During that period, he was president or a member of the post's board of directors for 14 years.

In 1963, Bob transferred his membership to General Smedley D. Butler Post 701 in White Oak. His qualities of leadership promptly brought him to the forefront and in 1965 he was elected senior commander and the next year assumed the post's top office. In subsequent years he served as post commander on four separate occasions: 1970, 1973, 1974, and 1975.

In June, 1975, Bob was elected commander of the 33d District, holding that office until 1977. He has held various posts at the Legion's district, county, State, and national levels and presently is a member of the national legislative committee.

Bob also is active in other veterans organizations, including the American Legion Honor Society in Pittsburgh; Charles Zischkau Post 207, VFW, in Turtle Creek; Amvets Post 8, McKeesport, and the Allied Veterans Organization of the Greater McKeesport area.

An employee of Westinghouse Electric Corp., where he is an adviser for the junior achievement chapter, Bob's military service involved a 4-year tour of duty with the U.S. Navy during World War II. He is married to the former Elva K. Thomasson and the couple have two children: Sandra and Robert D. Goss III. There also are two grandchildren: Shamara and Jason.

Mr. Speaker, few men have devoted as much time and energy to the service of the American veteran than has Robert D. Goss Jr. Few men have given so much of themselves to better the lives of their comrades in arms.

On behalf of the Congress of the United States and a grateful Nation I offer our sincere appreciation to this man who has served so long and so well.●

YORK CATHOLIC HIGH SCHOOL WINS CHAMPIONSHIP ON ST. PATRICK'S DAY

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, as luck would have it, Irish luck that is, St. Patrick's Day was celebrated with exceptional fervor in my home district this year.

For not only were the residents of York County celebrating the traditional holiday but they were also joining in the victory celebration of the York Catholic High School basketball team which that night won the men's AA State basketball championship.

The Fighting Irish, as they are appropriately named, brought to York the first such basketball championship in the league's history—but they brought home much more. As an editorial in the York Dispatch said afterwards:

> The victory ignited a fresh infusion of good will and high spirits among our people—a feeling not just to remember but one to nurture as well.

And so it should be.

The Irish, coached by the talented Gary Markle, won the well-played game by only one point in the finishing seconds of the contest against Northgate High School. The team members include Anthony Iati, Mark Dearborn, John Vottero, Keith Alleyne, James Forjan, Thomas Zielinski, David Strausbaugh, Stephen Kushner, Darren Surdich, Robert James, Joseph Crumbling, Gerry MacIntyre, Stephen Hoffman, and Bryan

Munchel. The victory was York Catholic's 19th straight win, finishing the season with a record of 32 victories, 2 defeats. Thousands throughout the county, former opponents and supporters alike, have joined in congratulating York Catholic on this accomplishment and I just wanted to add my hearty congratulations as well. I must add my condolences to my colleague DOUG WALGREN whose district includes Northgate High School; but then he should have anticipated the outcome on this St. Patrick's Day.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the entire editorial from the March 20, 1978, York Dispatch for the RECORD:

CONGRATULATIONS

Our congratulations to York Catholic High School's state championship basketball team.

Our salute also to all the people, particularly from high schools from throughout the city and county, who helped to cheer on the York Catholic team.

This was a generous outpouring of goodwill that will long be remembered together with the state championship.

York Catholic's victory in the eastern regional finals stirred community pride and inspired a memorable county-wide rally at the courthouse Friday afternoon. It propelled thousands of York countians to Hershey Friday night where the Fighting Irish captured the state championship.

But the joy and the goodwill didn't stop there. The traffic jam—the horns sounding victory—as the thousands streamed back to York was something to behold. From the George Street exit off the expressway, all the way through North York—what time was it anyway, after midnight?—lights were blazing, people were out on their porches and waved greetings to the huge returning motorcade.

Then in the biting cold of Continental Square stood some York Suburban fans with a banner of congratulations to the Green and Gold. Thousands welcomed the team at York Catholic.

Yes, it was quite a night. York Catholic produced a rare state basketball championship for us. But more than that. The victory ignited a fresh infusion of goodwill and high spirits among our people—a feeling not just to remember but one to nurture as well.●

TORRIJOS REFUSES TO HONOR DECONCINI AMENDMENT

HON. STEVEN D. SYMMS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, on April 5, on the 11 p.m. CBS news, Carl Rowan gave a special report on the new development in the Panama Canal negotiations. Mr. Rowan said that General Torrijos was contacting other Latin American nations saying that he could not accept the DeConcini amendment to the Neutrality Treaty under any circumstances. Torrijos claims that the military intervention language of the amendment violates the United Nations Charter and the O.A.S. Charter.

There were several Senators that claimed they voted for the Neutrality Treaty solely because the DeConcini amendment has been incorporated in the treaty. If Torrijos will not honor that amendment, perhaps those Senators should consider changing their vote.●

TURKEY TURNS AWAY

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN, Mr. Speaker, the recent remarks by Secretary of State Vance with respect to the "linkage" between the progress of the Cyprus negotiations and United States assistance to Turkey is unfortunately too typical of the foreign policy of this administration. While pursuing better relations with Cuba, China, and Vietnam, and praising in the most extravagant terms the "freedom loving" regimes of Poland and Yugoslavia, it persists in making matters as difficult as possible for friendly, pro-Western governments.

Without commenting on the relative merits of the Turkish and Greek cases in Cyprus, I think that it is time that we started to reassess the sometimes ambivalent attitude that we have expressed toward Turkey. As in the Middle East, our allies are unfortunately positioned on opposite sides of a dispute.

A thoughtful article on Turkey and on its relations with the United States was printed recently in The New Republic, authored by Bernard Lewis, a professor of near eastern studies at Princeton. Following is the full text of this article:

[From the New Republic]

TURKEY TURNS AWAY—WHAT HAVE WE DONE FOR HER LATELY?

(By Bernard Lewis)

The government of Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit has assumed power at a time when the mood of most politically conscious Turks is one of disappointment with the West—disappointment verging on revulsion. For more than a century, the Turks have been westernizing—and doing so deliberately for the last 50 years at least. This westernization has affected them both internally and internationally. Within Turkey there has been a gradual, painful but nevertheless genuine development of a western way of life, with a mixed economy and a parliamentary democracy, renewed and sustained despite successive revolutions and upheavals. Despite the continuing crisis resulting from the absence of an effective parliamentary majority for any party in the Assembly, Turkey has retained a commitment to democracy. Internationally, The Turkish Republic, after a period of neutrality identified itself with the West in the Anglo-Franco-Turkish alliance of 1939. Since the announcement of the Truman Doctrine in 1947, Turkey has pursued a generally pro-Western alignment in international affairs. Turkey dispatched a brigade to Korea in 1950 and remains firmly committed to the Council of Europe, to NATO and to CENTO.

This westernization has not been easy for the Turks. It has imposed a crisis of identity upon a people who, after all, came from Asia, professed Islam and belonged by tradition to the Middle Eastern Islamic world where for many centuries they had been unchallenged leaders. Modern Turkey was regarded in some Muslim and Asian countries as a betrayer of both Islam and Asia. The Turks frequently were denounced in India and elsewhere as lackeys of the West—slavish imitators who had renounced their heritage and had forfeited their self-respect.

At first, the Turks were untroubled by such criticisms. They were barely aware of most of it, which in any event came from sources to which they attached no importance. Nor were they much more troubled by the tension and hostility between themselves and the Soviet Union. To most Turks, Russia was the power that had wrested many territories from the Ottoman Empire and still ruled over the greater part of the Turkish peoples. Communism was a disruptive movement that sought to destroy all that was best in the Turkish revolution and revival. To most Turks, Russia was the hereditary and implacable enemy against which they always needed the close friendship and support of the West.

Even inside Turkey, there were groups that opposed this westernization. In recent years these groups have begun to acquire some political importance. This new importance derives from two sources. The first is the new democracy in Turkey—freedom of the press, freedom of discussion in the universities, free and open elections—which gave an opportunity for the expression of opinions, some old and deep-rooted, some new and fashionable, which previously had been repressed or suppressed. The second factor is the changing international situation and the vastly increased importance of countries and regions that the Turks previously had been accustomed to disregard.

Criticism of westernization came mostly from three sources. The first source was the upholders of traditional Islam, those who had opposed the abolition of the Sultanate, the abrogation of the Holy Law, the reform of the alphabet and the transformation of Turkey into a secular, modern republic. Under Atatürk, and to a lesser extent under his successors, traditionalist views were suppressed and were without political effect. In the democratic republic they find free expression and command blocs of votes. Of course these are small blocs. In the 1973 and 1977 elections the Republican People's Party, campaigning on a program of modernism, received 33.3 percent and 41.6 percent of the votes, while the National Salvation Party, the parliamentary exponent of militant Islamism, dropped from 11.8 percent to 8.6 percent of the votes. But Islamic themes occur frequently in the election propaganda of the other parties. And the inability of any party to get a stable majority of its own, along with strong international support from other Islamic countries, have given the views of the National Salvation Party an influence out of proportion to its size. Just after World War II militant Islamic Republic of Pakistan attempted to promote Islamic movements in Turkey, but these attempts came to nothing and may even have had a backlash effect. Today, the forces of political pan-Islamism are vastly more powerful than they were and are sustained by immense economic power.

A second source of criticism against Turkish Westernization is what might be called fashionable pan-leftism—fashionable ideologies and even more fashionable postures imported, primarily, from Paris, London, and New York. These are of course opposed to the United States, to the Western alliance, to the Council of Europe, to NATO, to capitalist economics, to military alliances, to non-Soviet bases and the rest. Such views now command overwhelming support in intellectual and, more particularly, in academic circles, where intellectual leftism has achieved a position of tyrannical power that is not far short of that which it enjoys in France.

As in other countries this fashionable leftism is often associated with another vogue: third worldism—a desire to identify with third world movements against the West. For young Turks this sympathy for the third world has an added poignancy: but for the choices of Atatürk and his associates they too could have had the opportunity to be sinless Afro-Asians instead of guilt-ridden Europeans.

The influence of these opposition movements is growing in a country shaken by a series of severe economic crises and subject to political tensions arising from both foreign and domestic problems. They have been nurtured by the feeling of disappointment and betrayal and more particularly the sense of being abandoned, isolated and friendless in a hostile world. In a world where almost all countries are organized in groups or blocs, the Turks find themselves alone: not part of the Islamic bloc, not part of the third world bloc, not part of the Communist bloc and, as they see it, forsaken and betrayed by the Western block to which they had made such great efforts to belong.

The feeling of disappointment began almost 30 years ago, when the Cyprus question entered the public debate. Already at that time, before the ending of British colonial rule, a feeling was growing in Turkey that on this issue the West was with the Greeks and against them. A common argument heard at the time—and with far greater urgency and frequency since then—was that even though Turkey had tried so hard to become part of Europe, even though Turkey had rendered such loyal service to various European causes, nevertheless "when it comes to the crunch you are with the Greeks and against us because the Greeks are Christians and we are Muslims." Among the educated elite the charge often takes a slightly different form: that the Greeks are the spoiled and pampered children of the West, which sees in them the heirs of ancient Hellas. Such feelings have been encouraged by what is seen in Turkey as a negative and unwelcoming attitude towards them by the European Economic Community (as contrasted with the friendlier and more welcoming attitude toward Greece). Above all, the Turks believe the United States has failed to give them the support that they deserve, and in particular, to appreciate the strategic importance of Cyprus to Turkey. The Turks believe their exemplary patience on the Cyprus question during the long years of Greek rule and oppression of the Turkish minority went unnoticed and unrewarded. When they sought to enforce their rights in 1964, they were held back by threats from President Johnson—an incident that is still remembered and resented, and is regarded by many Turks as a turning point in their relationship with the US.

All this is insignificant compared to more recent developments in Cyprus. Some Turks draw a bitter contrast between the Egyptian-Syrian attack in October 1973 and their own invasion of Cyprus in the following year. The Egyptians and Syrians, at that time seen as hostile to the United States, launched a military attack against Israel, generally seen as a close ally of the United States. Far from being rebuked in any way, they were given diplomatic, political and other rewards. When the Turks too decided to take unilateral military action in defense of what they saw as their vital national interests—and, moreover, did so in accordance with rights conferred upon them by previous agreements—they were given very different treatment. As they see it, they were subjected to humiliating pressures and placed in a position of great danger. This reinforced growing Turkish doubts about the value of the American alliance. They saw a lack of purpose and clarity in American policy, an occasional inability to distinguish between friends and enemies, and an alarming fickleness.

The U.S. embargo on arms to Turkey and the effort to force Turkey to make concessions to Greece were a bitter blow to the government of Prime Minister Suleyman Demirel, which had staked its political future on the Western alliance and which had great difficulty in surviving with a narrow-based coalition including two extremist parties, one pan-Turkish and the other Islamic. Pressures from inside grew steadily and since there were no improvements in Turkish-American relations, the Demirel government was soon in deep trouble. Political critics of the government demanded a stronger line in dealing with both Americans and Greeks. In response to these voices, Demirel reluctantly closed down the American bases. Turks are keenly aware of their importance to the United States, and have a sometimes unrealistic belief in American awareness of that importance. Many maintain that the American need for Turkey is greater than the Turkish need for America. But even without such beliefs, their pride will not allow them to accept what they see as the status of a satellite.

Turkish military experts are afraid that if the United States continues to send military supplies to Greece and withholds them from Turkey, a dangerous imbalance between the armed forces of the two countries would result. Greece and Turkey confront each other today in the Aegean—not through proxies, and on familiar ground, as in Cyprus, but in unknown waters, and face to face. The change in relative strengths of the armies and navies is fairly slow, but the imbalance between the air forces is developing very rapidly. Some senior Turkish officers argue that if this continues, Turkey would have no option but to launch a preemptive strike. They point out that the preemptive strike and the undeclared war have been made respectable in the Middle East.

If the U.S. continues to withhold arms from Turkey, hedges arms sales with unacceptable conditions, the Turks will find it impossible to maintain its Western alignment.

But where else can they go? Some have argued for a third-world type of neutrality and alignment with India and other countries in this group. They argue the need to win third world support for their cause against Greece, and express alarm at the immense voting majorities for Greece among the third world nations at the UN. These nations dismiss the reality that Greece, too, is a NATO country with a Western alignment, referring to the third-world line followed by Markarios. Turkish statesmen are well aware that third worldism is an illusion—that there is little possibility of collecting third-world votes in the United Nations, and that even if they succeed it would do nothing to help them in any real emergency. Nevertheless, they know that such policies are politically popular.

Another line is that of pan-Islam. Here there has been a notable change in Turkish policy. Previously the Turkish Republic, as a secular, modern state, shunned all Islamic groupings and was represented, if at all, by unofficial observers at inter-Islamic governments. Under Demirel Turkey began to send high officials to represent it at such meetings. In May 1976, Turkey invited the Islamic Foreign Ministers' conference to convene in Istanbul and joined, albeit with some Islamic resolutions. These condemned almost all non-Muslim powers ruling over Muslim populations except in India and the Soviet Union. In dealing with Islamic countries there is a further consideration beyond the desire to gain votes from the Greeks at the UN: the hope of economic gain, partly through commercial links with the oil companies and partly through what is seen as a natural export market for the developing industries of Turkey. It is argued that the Turks may have little chance of industrial exports to the Western world, but they may find a natural market in Islamic Africa where their prestige as a leading Muslim nation would help them. This economic argument seems to carry more weight than the mirage of Arabian petrodollars, to which experienced Turks do not seem to attach great importance.

Most Turkish leaders are hard-headed and well aware that the third-world and Islamic blocs have little real political and even less military power, and that in the event of a confrontation with the Soviet Union—a possibility that all Turks worry about—such alliances would be worthless. Nevertheless, these alliances are believed to have short-term value. If America abandons Turkey, or if America acts in a way that compels Turkey to abandon America, then the leaders would not wish to be left in total isolation with nowhere else to go but to the Soviet bloc. The third world and Islamic alternatives might tide the government over a domestic crisis by presenting an acceptable illusion of solidarity to the Turkish people and allowing them to believe that they are not entirely alone in the world.

Such a calculation is not unreasonable, and might indeed help the government to survive a difficult transition period. But for a country in the position of Turkey, on the southern border of the Soviet Union, the kind of policies pursued by India or Syria are simply not possible.

Some Turks favor a Swedish-style neutrality. This is self-evidently impossible. Turkey lacks the social, industrial and political stability and power of Sweden. Furthermore, Sweden has Finland on one side and NATO on the other, while Turkey has the Soviet Union on one side and the Arab world on the other—a much less secure position. Others frankly recognize the impossibility of a Swedish stance and hope to achieve a Finnish-style neutrality, though even here their position would be less favorable than that of Finland, which has proved itself in two bloody wars and has, moreover, the advantage of Sweden and NATO on its Western flank. Turkey, on the contrary would be surrounded by enemies or lukewarm friends.

There are few in Turkey who wish to join the Soviet orbit. They know very well what this would mean—a status at best like that of Finland, more probably like that of Czechoslovakia or Poland or possibly even of Uzbekistan. But Turks are realists and always have refused to depend on unpredictable help from elsewhere. There are already many kinds of accommodation with the Soviet Union, as for example the mending of the diplomatic fences and concessions in such matters as maritime passage through the Straits and overflights across Turkish territory. There has even been some cultural rapprochement. What was previously a danger to Turkish-Russian relations—the presence of large Turkish communities in the Soviet empire—has been turned by the Russians into a kind of advantage. Parties of Turkish artists, lecturers and others have been invited to visit the Turkic republics of the USSR while performers from these republics have been sent to Turkey. The numbers of Turkics in the USSR is rising rapidly; they may soon outnumber the Slavs. Their position on both sides of the Soviet-Chinese frontier gives them a vital strategic importance. The potential role of Turkey, as the leading Turkic power and indeed the only independent state in the Turkic world, has grown accordingly, and for this reason too the Russians must seek to win over or at least neutralize the Turkish leadership.

The two major parties in Turkey, which together polled 78.3 percent of the votes, both support continued westernization. The real danger is not the triumph of a pro-Soviet force inside Turkey, but rather alienation and drift. These easily could cause the detachment of Turkey from its Western allies and the gradual growth of Soviet influence to the point where, in a country with a common frontier with the USSR, the process becomes irreversible.

If Turkey goes, Iran will follow. With Soviet power established in Turkey the Russians at last would have the territorial contiguity which they have hitherto lacked and which has made all their successes in the Arab lands, however great, ultimately precarious. Turkey is the Soviet key to the Middle East—and the Middle East is the key to Asia and Africa.●

SPARE A DIME

HON. BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Speaker, in light of the continuing financial crisis in our Nation's urban areas, I believe it is of interest to all Americans to receive input and information from a wide spectrum of sources.

The particular need for loan guarantees and Federal support for New York City, our Nation's premier city, is thoughtfully discussed in the following editorial from the prestigious London Economist of January 21, 1978:

SPARE A DIME

If New York city were a foreign country—and many Americans feel that it almost is—it would have called in the International Monetary Fund long ago. The IMF's reaction to a country of 8m people (nearly 1m of whom were on welfare) whose government had run up $14 billion in debt and an annual deficit of $500m, which had a faltering domestic economy and no credit, would be predictable enough. It would impose strict conditions of fiscal rectitude on that country's politicians in return for a standby credit to bail them out.

That is exactly what America's federal government should now do to New York city's government as it enters its third financial crisis since 1975. The immediate problem facing the city is how to finance itself after June 30th when the $2.3 billion that the federal government advanced in seasonal loans three years ago is called in.

The longer-run question, however, is whether New York city's finances are ever going to be put on a sound footing. Seasonal loans and patched-up political deals mean that the city is forever at risk as both the loans and the deals have to be rolled over as they fall due.

This cycle can be broken. New York city needs $5.5 billion (of which approaching half might come on suitably IMF-like terms from the federal government in Washington) in long-term capital over the next four years. That sum should be enough for the city to refinance itself and win enough confidence to return to the municipal bond markets from which it has been excluded since 1975. The city's new mayor, Mr. Ed Koch, has the almost impossible task of restoring the necessary credibility to a budget kept at best artfully afloat by his predecessor, Mr. Abraham Beame. He began this week by sending an outline plan for the next four years to Washington.

But the old difficulties and vagaries that brought insolvency in 1975 are still there. New York is the only major city in America that has to pay for a share—25%—of its welfare costs: elsewhere this tab is picked up by the state government. Despite a partial refinancing of its debt the city is still weighed down with heavy short-term repayments; nearly $1 billion will be spent this year servicing debt. A huge 23% cut in the city's workforce in the past two years and a wage freeze have been imposed, but still the city's wage bill remains, mysteriously, unchanged. Unchanged also is the capacity for wishful thinking: the $86m city deficit that Mayor Beame was predicting only a few months ago for next year's budget was revealed this week to be closer to $500m.

In short, New York city's budget, while less of a disaster than it was in 1975, is still far from being under control. It is still true to say that if a corporate treasurer ran a shareholders' company as generations of New York politicians have run its budget that company would be bankrupt and its treasurer in jail.

Even the beginnings of order that have been imposed on New York's government have come largely from its two non-political financial watchdogs: the Municipal Assistance Corporation, which raises money on behalf of the city, and the Emergency Financial Control Board. But neither of these carries enough weight to guarantee the city's future financial behaviour or to lead it back to the public credit markets. Only the federal government can do that. Politically, therefore, the ball lies in Washington—with the administration which has yet to understand the scope of the problem, and with Senator Proxmire whose powerful banking committee must vote any long-term federal money.

Washington, of course, is unwilling to do much more than roll over its seasonal loans, if that. Aid to New York city is no vote-catcher in the middle or far west. Many congressmen feel that the 23% increase in federal welfare spending within the city limits over the past three years is effort enough.

But there is more to it than that. Without some long-term federal help New York city's government will jog along on the border of bankruptcy perhaps for a year or two, only tipping over it when the national economy turns down and a federal rescue would be hardest to mount. The federal government would then have to respond in the worst circumstances for itself if only to avoid the financial upheaval, with ramifications of Creditanstalt proportions rippling through the world banking system, that an overall $14 billion default by the city and, on its coattails maybe, an equivalent default by New York state, might cause.

WASHINGTON, BE BRAVE

A federal loan of $2.5 billion might not even have to be called. Its mere guarantee, like some IMF facilities, would make the city credit-worthy enough to raise money from elsewhere: from the Municipal Assistance Corporation, from city employee union pension funds, even from the banks. Such a loan should come attached with short strings. A new control board, with federal or congressional members, should keep close tabs on City Hall. It should extract commitments of assistance from New York state which has done little (despite the promise of $350m this week) to help the city in the past three years. To give such a watchdog real teeth it could be granted first call on the city's federal revenue-sharing funds, a guarantee that the federal loans would be repaid.

Some such scheme may emerge. But the betting at present is against it, that it will be politics as usual in the city of New York. And so half-hearted rescues as usual two or three years hence.●

FORMER REPRESENTATIVE CHET HOLIFIELD TO RECEIVE ANNUAL HERBERT ROBACK MEMORIAL AWARD

HON. JOHN J. McFALL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. McFALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to advise the Members that a former colleague and good friend, Chet Holifield, will be deservedly honored Thursday evening when the Washington chapter of the National Contract Management Association presents him the first Herbert Roback annual memorial award.

The award presentation by Comptroller General Elmer Staats will take place at 7 p.m. in the Sheraton International Conference Center in Reston, Va., during the Washington chapter's major symposium to increase procurement skills and understanding.

Our colleague, Representative FRANK HORTON will make the keynote speech of the evening.

Congressman Holifield is being honored as an "outstanding American who has made significant contributions to the procurement community."

Congressman Holifield was chosen for the award for his singular contributions to the Nation as a congressman for 32 consecutive years, and particularly—in terms of this award—for his contributions to the historic "Commission of Government Procurement."

Chet Holifield served in Congress as the Representative of the 19th district of my home State of California. Examples of his fine service to that district and the Nation are legion.

The Washington chapter of the NCMA established the award in memory of Herbert Roback, who at the time of his death last year, was director of studies for the Commission on Federal Paperwork. For 20 years, Mr. Roback has served the House Government Operations Committee. Government procurement was an area of special expertise for him.

Mr. Roback served as an adviser to Congressman Holifield when he served as a member and vice chairman of the Commission on Government Procurement. Herb Roback was a dedicated servant of this House and the American people. His death last year left a void not easily filled.

This is a fitting award to our former colleague with whom I and many others in this House were privileged to serve. For those who would wish to attend the dinner and award ceremony, my office would be glad to provide that information.●

EVEN THE DEAD ARE DISTURBED BY THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

○ Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, like ghosts the administration came to Capitol Hill on March 1 to sheepishly admit that the proposed Panama treaties completely overlooked making provisions for thousands of American dead, who are buried on U.S. property in the Canal Zone.

It happened before my Committee on Veterans Affairs. Appearing were representatives of the Department of Army, Department of State, the American Battle Monuments Commission, and the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

The basic thesis of the testimony was that no thought had been given to two major cemeteries with interred Americans during the treaty negotiations and they are unsure how the Panama Government will react to changing the treaty at this time.

A total of 4,903 U.S. citizens are interred in two cemeteries: Mount Hope and Corozal, which includes 909 American veterans. The current operation is administered and paid for by the Canal Zone Government.

The administration's appearance before the Veterans' Committee admitting matters overlooked by the treaties, which are highly sensitive and promise to be expensive to deal with, are indicative of the continuing problem the Congress faces in putting a real price tag on the costs to American citizens of the Panama Canal giveaway, which now is estimated in the billions.

The recommendations by the administration involved a third of a million dollars cost for disinterring 1,508 Americans in Mt. Hope and reinterring them in Corozal; but no provision for their care was outlined after the 20 years of the proposed treaties expire.

Is the American taxpayer to assume a new burden presently paid by the self-sufficient operation of the Canal Company for the privilege of turning over a waterway primarily used by the United States, even to the sacrifice of disturbing or leaving the dead who are part of the heritage which made the Zone American? Obviously, the Panama giveaway has great impact on the living but it also affects the dead.

I have now introduced legislation (H.R. 11415) similar to that which already has support of a majority of the Congress which will prevent any transfer of property in which Americans are buried in the Canal Zone without action by both Houses of Congress.●

J. HARDEN PETERSON

HON. CHARLES E. BENNETT

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, the death of former Congressman J. Harden Peterson is distressing news for all of the many thousands who knew him.

He was the dean of the Florida delegation when I came to Congress in 1949; and I had known him as a friend for many years before that. He was the first in the Florida delegation to be chairman of a major congressional committee, the Committee on the Interior. As such, he produced some of the major pieces of legislation to be passed here in decades. There are today many beautiful green acres in our National Park System which will be forever a memorial to his good work.

Warm, friendly almost to a fault, he gave a helping hand to me through the years we served together; and until his death last week. What a magnificent person he was. All who knew him extend our deepest sympathy to his lovely wife and family.●

SUPPORT FOR TUITION TAX CREDITS

HON. TOM CORCORAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the issue of tax credits for educational expenses continues to gain momentum around the country. As the House sponsor of the College Tuition Tax Relief Act of 1977, I am pleased to see so many Americans voicing their support for tax credits to assist them with the educational expenses at the college or university of their choice.

It appears that the House will have the opportunity to vote on tax credits for college education in the near future, and I would like to share with my colleagues the following letters, selected from the many I have received in support of this legislation:

Congressman TOM CORCORAN,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CORCORAN: In response to your year-end report, I would like to voice my approval of your College Tuition Tax Relief Act. For those of us who get neither financial aid nor grants, President Carter's latest proposal to add additional amounts to those on financial aid would do nothing to help pay college expenses, except for those already getting aid.

The original intent of financial aid was for those needy families who could not help their children go to college. However, the abuses of financial aid, food stamps, financial loans, etc. are evident, I am sure, to anyone who has children in college. Ideally, if these programs could be eliminated and replaced by disclosures submitted with a person's income tax, the temptation toward abuse might be greatly lessened. If the majority of student loans are not being repaid, why is it now proposed to increase funds allocated to cover the deficit, and if there is not the needed background check on financial aid applicants, how can this program continue without increasing abuse?

As a parent, I really believe college is the responsibility of the parents, not the middle class and not the elderly, but if continued abuse of the aid programs is allowed, how will these two groups be able to continue meeting the taxes imposed. I hope your Act provides realistic changes.

Also, if you would, I would appreciate an answer to a question I have as regards postal employment. I worked for 9½ years at APSA in Joliet before my marriage, under civil service. Recently I passed a civil service postal exam, and would like to know, should a vacanacy exist in my local post office, would my previous years of employment aid me in any way as far as preference.

Thank you, and I enjoy your reports,

Very truly yours,

Mrs. THOMAS FEDASH.

President JIMMY CARTER,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR PRESIDENT CARTER: My wife and I are in the middle income group if you consider our combined income in 1977 of $29,000. The total taxes taken out of our paychecks were $6,688. We probably will have to pay an additional $600 to $900 in Federal taxes when our income taxes are finalized. This means that we will probably pay between $7,200 and $7,500 in Federal, State and FCIA in 1977. This does not include real estate taxes, sales taxes, license fees, city sticker fees, gasoline taxes and all the other taxes which most Americans are obligated to pay.

We paid $1,545 into FCIA in 1977 and there is a possibility that neither of us will live to collect anything in Social Security benefits and if we do, it will be odds on that only one of us collects and only for a couple of years at the most. I am 55 and my wife is 50 years of age.

We have twin daughters who are going to college and we are paying the full cost. We spent $9,300 in savings and current earnings for the fiscal year and a half and then our daughters borrowed $3,500 to complete their second year in State universities although one daughter has been in an International study program in Austria and England during her second year which cost more. We also intend to borrow $10,000 in our daughters name provided we continue to qualify under the student loan Program. This means that we will owe approximately $13,500 in student loans when our daughters are finished with their fourth year in college.

Both of our daughters work during the summer to buy their own clothes and for spending money. We intend to pay off their loans after they graduate or before if possible.

My wife and I are both intelligent. We listen to 60 Minutes every week and the daily news and read the papers daily and the whole point of this is how is your educational program going to help us except make it easier for us to go further into debt? Only the very rich and the poor can afford to educate their children without going into debt or spending all their savings. When is the middle class going to be given something besides paying taxes? We are not in the position to make big write-offs for tax purposes. Shutting that off doesn't help us, either. It just gives the government more money to spend. We need a tax write off for their education too. Everybody is being taken care of but the middle class.

Sincerely yours,

RICHARD E. YOUNG, Jr.

NORTHERN PETROCHEMICAL COMPANY,
February 10, 1978.

Hon. TOM CORCORAN,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

Subject: Financial Aid for College Education

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CORCORAN: This letter will hopefully serve two purposes: first to express my appreciation for your program to allow direct tax credit for college expenses; and, secondly, to vent my frustration in the administration's answer to your proposal.

Your proposal of a direct tax credit is simple, straightforward, and will make the money available directly to the college student. The only two possible arguments I could see against your proposal are, first of all, the reduction in tax receipts when we are running a deficit budget; and, secondly, that this benefit would be applied even to the taxpayer with an extremely high income. This last objective is probably so minimal that it would affect a very small number of taxpayers.

The administration's proposal is beyond belief. It is typical of the concept that some new bureaucratic organization can take money from the taxpayers and disburse this money in a fair and equitable fashion. The fallacies in this line of thinking are so numerous that it is impossible to believe that right thinking individuals can propose such a system. The $1.6 billion proposed in the administration's plan will probably result in less than half of this money finally being used directly for college education. The addition of government employees to administer such a program is another example of a fast growing bureaucracy instead of the simplified government promise by President Carter during his campaign.

Once again I would like to express my appreciation for your proposal and hope that you have some success in convincing the Members of Congress that this is a much more practical proposal than the administration's scheme.

Sincerely your,

W. AUSTIN BOLLEN,
Plant Manager.

FEBRUARY 10, 1978.

Rep. THOMAS J. CORCORAN,
Longworth Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE CORCORAN: My husband and I wholeheartedly agree with you regarding your proposal of a tax credit for all college students.

We see nothing in President Carter's proposal to help us, the somewhere in the middle class taxpayers ($30,000 per year annual joint income).

As so many other wives, I returned to the work market over 10 years ago to help educate our two sons. We have no tax shelters * * * none * * * and it is taking both salaries just to cover "normal" living expenses and keep our sons in college.

I agree that President Carter's proposal would just add more redtape to the "bureaucracy" he promised to shrink.

Please keep up the good fight on this important legislation.

Cordially,

Mrs. FAYE FITZGERALD.●

THE JASONS

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to bring to your attention a most unusual group of Los Angeles residents, the "Jasons," who will be celebrating their golden anniversary at their annual installation and anniversary celebration on April 15, 1978. The Jasons was organized as an athletic group at a Boyle Heights playground in 1928, much like the little league teams of today. The club has met every Wednesday for 50 years—a notable record. As the members matured their horizons broadened to include large-scale contributions to community and charitable activities, including time, money, and blood to the Red Cross, City of Hope, and many other worthy causes.

The largest membership was 67, and the Jasons still includes 11 members who originated the club. The balance of the members have been in the club at least 38 years, and no new members have been invited to join since that time. During the 50 years of its existence well over $100,000 has been donated, and the club's present charities are the United Jewish Appeal and the City of Hope. The Jasons have never missed having a Mother's Day celebration, but it is now called Parents' Day to honor the last nine living fathers and mothers.

During World War II only 6 of the then 59 members were not in the service, and these 6, together with some of the wives, produced a monthly paper to inform all of the members in service of each others' activities. All the members lived in Boyle Heights at one time, most of them attending Roosevelt and Poly High Schools, and one attended Manual Arts. These people are probably closer to each other than most families. Joys and sorrows are shared, and most of the members travel together.

There are now 32 members left, and the average age is about 62. Two members died in the service, and eight more have passed on through natural causes. To honor them, the Jasons have started and are perpetuating a memorial plaque at the City of Hope. Today, some are retired; many are independent businessmen, and the rest hold responsible positions in their professions. The club has a great deal of memorabilia: motion pictures, photographs, correspondence, and trophies vividly commemorating the history of this remarkable assemblage of people, which would undoubtedly contribute significantly to the history of our city's past half century.

This positive, constructive, and long-lasting relationship of a group of devoted friends and good citizens gives us an example to be emulated. Congratulations to the Jasons on 50 wonderful years of brotherhood and friendship.●

"LIFTING THE ARMS EMBARGO AGAINST TURKEY"

HON. STEVEN D. SYMMS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, last week President Carter sent Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher and two other senior American diplomats to Turkey to discuss lifting the arms embargo against Turkey which has been in effect since 1975. Once again Congress is considering the $1 billion military aid program to Turkey and whether this aid package should be linked to the resolution of the Cyprus conflict.

In evaluating this aid package to Turkey, I think one has to look at what is happening in that part of the world now and how the balance of power could change in the future. I am very concerned about the growing Soviet military presence in the Mediterranean, the Middle East, and the Horn of Africa. In order to deal with this Soviet presence, most recently evidenced in Ethiopia, it is important that the United States maintain strong ties with its NATO allies.

Right now the southern flank of NATO is very weak due to our strained relations with Turkey. Our NATO bases there are operational, but with its current economic difficulties, Turkey may not be able to keep the bases fully operational in the future. We may not be able to depend on Italy which is allowing more Communist involvement in its government; and it is important that we have a stable, pro-Western ally which can counter some of the Soviet Union's activities. Because of Turkey's location bordering the Soviet Union, Iran, Iraq, and Syria, it plays quite an important role in world politics and will play a pivotal role in any future conflict in the Middel East.

As long as Turkey is allied with the West, there is some check on the Soviet Navy which must pass through the Turkish-controlled Dardanelle Straits to get from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean.

I know that the Greek community feels that the situation on Cyprus should be resolved before giving Turkey any military aid. But Cyprus has nothing to do with this issue and should not be linked to the agreement. This is a national security issue.

Turkey is a vital strategic ally that has always worked to preserve the West's interests. It is important that we lift the embargo on Turkey at this time and begin to shore up our defenses in that part of the world.●

EQUALITY UNDER THE LAW FOR SOVIET REFUGEES

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, last month I introduced a bill with my distinguished colleagues, Millicent Fenwick and Gladys Noon Spellman, H.R. 11508, that would allow paroled refugees the same treatment under the law as conditional refugees regarding the computation of their permanent resident status. Indochinese and Cuban refugees already receive this treatment, but refugees from the Soviet Union do not.

At the present time, conditional refugees must be in the United States several years before they can apply for permanent resident status. They then must have permanent resident status for 5 years before being eligible for citizenship. This 5-year period is computed from the time they arrived in the United States. Paroled refugees must also wait an initial period before receiving permanent resident status, but their 5-year permanent resident status requirement is computed from the day they received permanent resident status, not the day they entered this country.

In some cases, these paroled refugees entered the United States the same day as conditional refugees, but they must wait years longer to acquire citizenship. It is the aim of H.R. 11508 to provide Soviet refugees the same consideration under the law as is presently accorded the other major groups of refugees.

This bill is extremely simple and I am inserting into the RECORD the text of this bill for my colleagues' perusal.

H.R. 11508

A bill to provide that certain refugees who were paroled and later admitted for permanent residence into the United States will be treated, for determining their period of residence for purposes of naturalization, as establishing permanent residence status as of the date of their arrival to the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any alien who, before the date of enactment of this Act—

(1) was paroled into the United States as a refugee under section 212(d)(5) of the Immigration and Naturalization Act, and

(2) had his status adjusted to that of an alien lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence, shall, for purposes of section 316 of such Act, be regarded as lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of his arrival.●

A PIE FOR THE FTC

Hon. Theodore M. (Ted) Risenhoover

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, on February 28 the House rejected a conference report on some Federal Trade Commission legislation (H.R. 3816) and the bill now awaits Senate appointment of conferees.

In the past few days, there has been considerable press attention to the FTC and I have read two articles which I ask to be included in the RECORD.

The April 10 issue of Fortune, in a column called "Keeping Up," said:

Something like ten or twelve years ago, the kids around our house began showing a strong preference for programs featuring crime and mayhem, and since then we haven't heard much about Soupy Sales. Soupy's programs, as we recall them, were built around pie throwing and other madcap antics. We hadn't expected to be reminded of them, or him, when we picked up the recent FTC Staff Report on Television Advertising to Children. But there was his name, leaping up off the page, and it was immediately apparent that the FTC staff deemed his case highly significant.

The staff, as you have doubtless heard, is trying to persuade the commission to ban or severely circumscribe advertising directed to children. In doing so, it has the strong encouragement of Chairman Michael Pertschuk. The chairman, while not demanding capital punishment for those who advertise to children, did point out in one speech that under the Code of Hammurabi commercial exploitation of a child could be punishable by death.

The problem, as Pertschuk and the staff see it, is that children are so innocent. The staff report quotes Dr. Richard Feinbloom of the Harvard Medical School to the effect that "an advertisement to a child has the quality of an order, not a suggestion." The report then continues:

Dr. Feinbloom's point is illustrated, even as to children old enough to read and write, by the Soupy Sales case. On New Year's Day, 1965, the performer of that name suggested to his early morning audience of children that they go find the wallets of their sleeping fathers, take out "some of those funny green pieces of paper with all those nice pictures of George Washington, Abraham Lincoln and Alexander Hamilton, and send them along to your old pal, Soupy, care of WNEW, New York." According to Helitzer and Heyel [authors of a book called The Youth Market], who tell the story for the purpose of showing prospective advertisers to children "how easy it can be," enough money poured in to constitute "the biggest heist since the Boston Brink's robbery."

Our own view is that modern American children are not always so innocent. They are perfectly capable of talking back to their television sets. It is also our view that regulators out to nail business are not always so honest.

The fact is that old Soupy took in precisely four one-dollar bills after his broadcast. (He also got around 40,000 pieces of play money.) This fact was reported by the press at the time and could easily have been ascertained by those tireless research people at the FTC. Even the Helitzer and Heyel book, which devotes several paragraphs to the episode, is not entirely clear about whether a "heist" actually took place. In quoting a phrase that implies one surely did, the staff is proving something about its own intellectual honesty.

Or, possibly, its own innocence.

Paulette Keller's "Point of View" in the March 14 issue of the Washington Star deserves the attention of our colleagues:

DON'T TAKE A CHOICE AWAY

The Federal Trade Commission has looked with favor on a proposal which would ban TV commercials aimed at children "too young to understand the selling purpose" of advertising. It appears that sugared products which, it is suggested, post "serious dental health risks" surfaced as the real villian in the eyes of the FTC.

As a mother, a law school graduate and a health food advocate, I object to the proposal on a number of grounds.

First, I would remind President Carter that a tremendous number of people voted for him, as I did, because he promised to remove government interference from our personal lives. Now the FTC, part of the Executive Branch, believes it has the authority to tell me how to raise my children. By banning advertising to children, the government is saying to me. "We know what is best for your children." I disagree!

Ultimately it is the parents' responsibility to see that their children are well nourished. I use honey instead of sugar in my kitchen, but candy, soft drinks and sugared cereals are not banned in my house. I try to teach moderation but, finally, what my daughter eats is my responsibility. Actually, my five-year-old is pretty discriminating; since I explained the furor over red dyes, she always orders her "Shirley Temples" without the cherry.

If the anti-children's advertising group wants to put its message across, fine. They should buy commercial time on TV to give children and parents their point of view. Give me a choice, don't take one away. From the point of view of sound education, children must be taught to make critical choices for themselves; to attempt to look objectively at all possibilities, and to make decisions based on facts. One of the roles of parents and teachers is to help a child develop this type of judgment. Insulating children from their environment only serves to delay this important phase of their development.

The First Amendment guarantees freedom of speech and thought, and under our constitutional system we are assured freedom of choice. However, if the FTC continues to make rulings about what can and cannot be advertised, where will it end? Next some small group will want to ban ads for automobiles. Cars, after all, consume enormous amounts of fuel, pollute the environment, and cause an inordinate number of deaths each year. This may seem far fetched, but a precedent is being set here. Essentially, a small, elitist group has successfully convinced the FTC to consider limiting the amount of information people are allowed to receive about consumer products.

I find it remarkable that the chairman of the FTC, Mr. Pertshuk, went on record in favor of this proposal before it came under consideration by his commission. The attitudes he voiced are particularly repugnant to me:

"These advertisers suffer from moral myopia . . . using sophisticated techniques . . . they manipulate children's attitudes." To the contrary, it seems to me that this proposal—as taken under consideration by the FTC, is a chilling example of big government's manipulation of children's attitudes through edict.●

THE SUCCESS OF THE ST. LOUIS PRIDE PROGRAM

HON. ROBERT A. YOUNG

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention the remarkable success of a St. Louis program designed to improve the labor-management relations within the local construction industry. This program, which is called PRIDE (Productivity and Responsibility will Increase Development and Employment), has been recognized for its success by the National Center for Productivity and Quality of Working Life.

The following articles from the St. Louis Globe Democrat explain the basics of the program. I encourage my colleagues to read these insightful articles and share them with with construction leaders in their districts:

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat]

U.S. AGENCY COMMENDS PRIDE TO OTHER AREAS

WASHINGTON.—The St. Louis area's labor-management council on construction productivity and responsibility has been cited by a federal agency as an example for other communities seeking to foster cooperation between unions and employers.

The St. Louis council called PRIDE—for Productivity and Responsibility Increases Development and Employment—has had five major achievements since its founding in 1972, the National Center for Productivity and Quality of Working Life said in a 212-page national directory of such committees.

The federal agency published the directory in hopes of encouraging other cities and towns to form similar groups to improve local economies, save jobs and combat unemployment.

PRIDE was credited in the directory with these achievements through joint efforts by construction employers and the building and construction trades labor unions:

"Many work rules have been changed, and both sides have made concessions.

"No substantial employee-hours have been lost because of jurisdictional disputes.

"Home building costs have been reduced from among the most expensive to the fourth least expensive of the 16 major metropolitan areas surveyed by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board.

"Nonresidential construction costs have improved, as reflected in a survey by the Society of Civil Engineers.

"Communication and job conferences for specific projects and on-site box lunches sponsored by PRIDE have resulted in improved communication and morale."

Richard Mantia, Building and Construction Trades Council executive secretary-treasurer, and Al Fleischer, managing partner of Fleischer-Seeger Construction Co., were listed as PRIDE leaders.

The government directory also noted that the New Spirit of St. Louis Labor-Management Committee was formed last year to seek similar cooperation in the area's industrial and service sectors.

Also in the new directory are successful labor-management committees at the Army Reserve Components Personnel and Administration Center and the Veterans Administration Records Processing Center.

PRIDE COCHAIRMEN TO SHARE NATIONAL HONOR

(By Ted Schafers)

Richard Mantia, executive secretary-treasurer of the St. Louis Building Trades Council, and Alfred J. Fleischer Sr., St. Louis contractor, as co-chairmen of PRIDE, will be honored in New York Wednesday, Feb. 15, for their outstanding contributions to the construction industry in 1977 by the editors of Engineering-News Record Magazine.

Both men are credited with having played leading roles in the development of respect and cooperation between management and labor within the St. Louis industry in recent years. And the best proof that their efforts have paid off was the renegotiation of all contracts which had expired last year—without a single strike—and the changing of work rules to encourage more jobs.

PRIDE is an acronym for Productivity and Responsibility will increase Development and Employment.

The board of directors is divided to represent six elements of the construction industry, namely unions, contractor-employers, each with five members, plus representatives for engineers, architects, suppliers, and the Construction Users' Council, whose members are the buyers of construction in this area.

THE BOARD meets monthly, but the co-chairmen carry the day-to-day workload, moving in to defuse potentially explosive disputes and help local union officials sell the programs to their rank and file.

Convincing members to moderate labor demands during this period of constant inflation has not been an easy job. And the same applies to efforts made by the group to obtain elimination or modification of restrictive work rules in order to make union contractors more competitive.

At a dinner here in November when Mantia was honored by St. Louis Construction News & Review as "Construction Man of the Year", he said:

"IT TAKES A STRONG leader to go down the right path, but if people don't follow, it's a lonely path".

The big difference, however, has been that Mantia has had the courage to speak out against practices, which in the past had given St. Louis a bad labor image and high unemployment. Said Fleischer of Mantia:

"He has found the courage to say the things that are good for all of us. Thanks to PRIDE we have learned to communicate. Because industry factions no longer just look out for their own interests, the whole construction industry benefits."

THIS IS THE second such national recognition for Mantia. In 1975 he and Charles Dougherty, president of Union Electric were cited for their roles in what has to be considered a most improbable turn of events.

Dougherty was honored for having had the courage "to back up his warnings against unproductive union work practices" on UE power plants by hiring an open (merit) shop construction company to build the utility's nuclear power plant in Calloway County.

AT THE SAME TIME Mantia was cited for his leadership in drafting a modified contract which made AFL–CIO members competitive to non-union or independent union work. In general, those concessions involved acceptance of wage rates or work rules prevailing in contracts of unions having jurisdiction at the plant site and waiver of any travel time.

"We didn't like some of the things we had to do, but it was a matter of getting most of that work for our own people," said Mantia who added:

"The awards are the result of a lot of fine work done by many people in labor and management. I'm proud of the support I've received from our member unions which have had the courage to do what is necessary to make St. Louis competitive with any major section of the country. Everyone benefits, the engineer, architect, supplier, contractor and labor—and above all the community".

So far as this writer knows, every major building erected here in recent years has been completed on or ahead of scheduled completion date, and some under cost estimates, despite the impact of constant inflation.

Jurisdictional disputes that often tied up projects in the past have been virtually eliminated because of prejob conferences to avoid misunderstandings plus a willingness by all parties to abide by national procedures to resolve differences.

Unions that once insisted on double-time pay after 4 to 5 p.m. now work beyond those hours for small premiums, which has brought a lot of new work in plants that can only do remodeling after normal production hours.

Fabrication that once had to be scheduled on the job site can now be done in shops so that there are no delays due to bad weather and bring about better manpower utilization.

Al Hinton, assistant manager of the Associated General Contractors here, who handles PRIDE's administrative work, said leaders of the organization have been repeatedly invited to speak before construction groups in other cities on the results achieved in St. Louis.

"Some of our board members have appeared before their own national industry organizations. The Regional Commerce and Growth Association (RCGA) has cooperated in publicizing PRIDE's work to local companies intent on developing better relations between management and labor," he added.

Also a spokesman for the National Center for Productivity and Quality of Life has visited St. Louis to review PRIDE's operations and has indicated a desire to organize a national seminar on the subject.

"Productivity and responsibility," the keystones of PRIDE are not only paying off with "increased Development and Employment" in the St. Louis construction industry but are likely to generate similar dividends in other parts of the country.

As for St. Louis said Manita:

"Prospects of new work for construction is bordering on the fantastic. Without counting some of the big downtown projects, like the proposed Merchantile Mall or other Convention Center construction, there is enough work for most crafts to keep them very busy, especially among carpenters, insulators, iron workers, cement masons and bricklayers. In fact, some smaller contractors are no longer bidding on new work and are urging customers to delay seeking bids until later this year", he declared.●

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. DONALD J. MITCHELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to join in the widespread commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic. It was in the spring of 1918 that the Byelorussians proudly declared their independence from Tsarist Russia, and it is appropriate to the strong and independent spirit of the Byelorussian people that now, as then, their continuing refusal to accept foreign oppression coincides with the season that symbolizes new life.

The 60th anniversary of the Republic's brief existence before once again falling under the domination of Russia is a sobering reminder to us that there are many proud peoples and nationalities in the world who have little of the freedom we take so much for granted. It also serves to remind us that many of those among us have come to the United States in part to preserve cultural traditions that are repressed in other countries in the name of unity and in fear of diversity.

The Byelorussian people and the Americans of Byelorussian descent personify the desire for self-determination and freedom that the United States continually champions throughout the world. They realize that the human spirit is stronger and more lasting than empires and ideologies, and I and my colleagues extend our admiration for their spirit and our support for their struggle.●

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, it has been 60 years since the courageous nation of Byelorussia shook itself free from centuries of foreign domination and declared itself a free and independent nation. It was a commendable and heartening step for the Byelorussians, who spent the 19th and early 20th centuries strengthening their culture and forming a political entity.

But their independence, which was declared March 25, 1918, was sadly short lived. During the winter of 1918, Soviet Russia's Red Army invaded and conquered Byelorussia. The result was a divided nation and the creation of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic under the auspices of the U.S.S.R.

Byelorussia's independence was brought to a halt, but the spirit behind it did not die. Today it is alive in the hearts of Byelorussians everywhere—whether here in America or across the ocean where Byelorussians are still under Soviet rule.

Soviet practices are working to squelch the cultural gains made by the Byelorussians during the years preceding their declaration of independence. After annihilating many of the nation's leaders after World War II, they now kept most Byelorussians out of political affairs and have made Russian the official language for the country. The Soviet Union continues to deny Byelorussians the right to exercise the principle of self-determination and continues to suppress their human rights.

It is with pride that I join with Americans of Byelorussian descent as they pay tribute to their courageous ancestors who declared independence 60 year ago. I also share with them the hope that Byelorussia will someday shed oppression and gain independence once again.●

PANAMA CANAL TREATY REQUIRES PROPERTY DISPOSAL, APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZATION AND IMPLEMENTING AUTHORITY

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have today written to the chairman of several House committees urging immediate consideration of H.R. 11634, a bill to provide the congressional authorization required by clause 2, section 3, article IV of the Constitution, for the transfer to Panama of the property of the United States in the Canal Zone; to authorize the appropriations required by clause 7, section 9, article I of the Constitution, to implement that transfer of U.S. property, including the transfer of military installations and of cemeteries in which U.S. veterans are interred, the closing of the Canal Zone courts, and the assumption by the U.S. Postal Service of the functions of the Canal Zone postal service; to otherwise provide legislatively the authorizations not provided pursuant to clause 2, section 3, article II of the Constitution which are necessary to implement the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977, and related agreements; and for other purposes.

The title of this legislation was designed to be both constitutionally functional and educational to those who do not understand that three legislative facets, not one, are involved in the proposed transfer of the Panama Canal Zone: First, disposal of property; second, authorization for appropriations; and third, implementing authority to supplement treaty approval.

Although I oppose the proposed treaties, someone had to get the implementing legislation out of the backrooms and onto the table where it can be properly assigned, scrutinized and discussed.

To the committees on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, International Relations, Judiciary, and Post Office and Civil Service, I submitted on April 10, 1978, the following letter:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I introduced on March 16 H.R. 11634 which has been referred to your committee. This legislation is to authorize the transfer to Panama of the property of the United States in the Canal Zone, to authorize appropriations to carry out the details of that transfer, and to authorize other implementing provisions pursuant to the Panama Canal Treaty.

The title of this bill is consistent with Articles I, II, and IV of the U.S. Constitution and incorporates unchanged the Administration's Draft being circulated among Members of Congress for implementing the Treaty now in the final stages of consideration before the U.S. Senate.

It appears most timely that this legislation be called up for immediate consideration by your committee and I respectfully request that this be done in the interests of protecting the prerogatives of the House and to allay misunderstandings among officials of the Administration, the Senate and the Courts, and the public in general.

Sincerely,

GEORGE HANSEN,
Member of Congress.

To the Committee on Armed Services and Veterans' Affairs, I submitted on April 10, 1978 the following letter:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have introduced H.R. 11634 which I believe should have been referred to our committee. This legislation is to authorize the transfer to Panama of the property of the United States in the Canal Zone, to authorize appropriations to carry out the details of that transfer, and to authorize other implementing provisions pursuant to the Panama Canal Treaty.

The title of this bill is consistent with Articles I, II, and IV of hte U.S. Constitution and incorporates unchanged the Administration's Draft being circulated among Members of Congress for implementing the Treaty now in the final stages of consideration before the U.S. Senate.

Included in this title is specific reference to matters under the jurisdiction of our committee which are of sufficient significance to merit a request that this legislation be also referred to our authority for proper review.

Your action in this matter would now appear to be most timely and I respectfully request that this be done and that the legislation be called up by our committee for immediate consideration in the interests of protecting the prerogatives of the House and to allay misunderstandings among officials of the Administraiton, the Senate and the Courts, and the public in general.

Sincerely,

GEORGE HANSEN,
Member of Congress.

To the committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I submitted on April 10, 1978 the following letter:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have introduced H.R. 11634 which I believe should have been referred to your committee. This legislation is to authorize the transfer to Panama of the property of the United States in the Canal Zone, to authorize appropriations to carry out the details of that transfer, and to authorize other implementing provisions pursuant to the Panama Canal Treaty.

The title of this bill is consistent with Articles I, II, and IV of the U.S. Constitution and incorporates unchanged the Administration's Draft being circulated among Members of Congress for implementing the Treaty now in the final stages of consideration before the U.S. Senate.

There appears to be sufficient impact in this legislation on matters under the jurisdiction of your committee to merit a request that this legislation be also referred to your authority for proper review.

Your action in this matter would now seem to be most timely and I respectfully request that this be done and that the legislation be called up by your committee for immediate consideration in the interests of protecting the prerogatives of the House and to allay misunderstandings among officials of the Administration, the Senate and the Courts, and the public in general.

Sincerely,

GEORGE HANSEN,
Member of Congress.●

KEEPING OUR EYES ON U.S. HISTORY

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I was extremely proud recently when the Freedoms Foundation at Valley Forge presented the Valley Forge Honor Certificate Award to television station WGHP in High Point, N.C. It was the second year in succession that the award had been given to WGHP–TV, and the station this year was the only one in North Carolina to be so honored.

The award was given for the program, "Monitor: Time Capsule of the Past," which told the story of the ironclad Monitor, which sank off Cape Hatteras in 1862. The program traced the history of the vessel from its construction to the battle with the Merrimac, its loss at sea, and the recent discovery of its remains.

Robert W. Miller, president of the Freedoms Foundation, correctly described the program when he said it is "an outstanding accomplishment in helping to achieve a better understanding of the American way of life." The award was received with laudable humility, expressed well by Eugene H. Bohi, vice president and general manager of WGHP–TV, when he said:

. . . we're honored that TV8 can support America by contributing to the development of a responsible citizenship by informing the public on past history in addition to helping solve contemporary current problems through news and documentary programming.

I share the pride of WGHP–TV, which covers my district, and salute its excellent staff for highlighting our American heritage in such an entertaining and impressive way.●

LET'S DECLARE THE ENERGY CRISIS OVER

HON. PAUL FINDLEY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, the soundest reasoning I have yet seen on energy was written by our colleague, Congressman DAVE STOCKMAN of Michigan as a "point of view" piece published in the Sunday, April 9, Washington Post.

Ever since Richard Nixon called for energy independence I have opposed the notion, believing it to be against both our short-term and long-term interests. Now I know why. DAVE STOCKMAN has put the case beautifully for a renewal of our faith in the disciplines of the market system.

Here is the text of his article:

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 9, 1978]

THE ILLOGIC OF ENERGY INDEPENDENCE

(By DAVE STOCKMAN)

One of the most pernicious forces loose in Washington is the widely shared belief in the need for national energy independence. Beguiled by its deceptive allure, we are fashioning policies that would undermine our economy, further weaken our balance-of-payments position, and foist on the American people an unnecessary expansion of government control and cost.

The Carter administration's National Energy Plan raises the quest for energy self-sufficiency to a new plateau of illogic. It amounts to little more than a hastily compiled list of costly expedients for reducing the volume of oil imports. As such, it is not an energy policy at all but a throwback to antiquated notions of general autarky.

It is time to state the terrifying truth to Messrs. Schlesinger and Carter: The level of oil imports per se doesn't matter. What is important is that the energy needs of the U.S. economy be supplied at the lowest possible cost. In practical terms, this can be achieved by increased production of domestic oil and gas, coal substitution and energy conservation—but only to the extent possible at a cost equal to or less than the prevailing price of energy in the world economy—$13 per barrel equivalent.

To reach this goal of supplying our energy needs at the least cost, we do not need a Project Independence, a National Energy Plan, Department of Energy regulatory programs, mandatory efficiency standards, or subsidized development of "energy alternatives." The market is fully capable of accomplishing this at the world price without the guidance of Congress and the executive branch.

Even at the present artificially low domestic energy prices imposed by oil and gas regulatory controls, the boom in such products as insulation, engineered fireplaces and industrial heat recovery systems demonstrates that both the household and business sectors of the economy will respond to pricing signals.

Indeed, the only major unfinished business in energy policy is the creation of a domestic energy pricing structure tied to the world price of oil. Rapid decontrol of oil and gas prices and the adjustment of utility rate schedules to reflect true costs of providing service to all customers would accomplish this with a minimum of regulatory cost. With a realistic price structure in place, the relentless cost-minimizing pressures of the marketplace would drive domestic energy production to its maximum and reduce consumption to its minimum at cost levels equivalent to the world price.

The result would be a significant reduction in U.S. oil imports. But, unlike the arbitrary displacement imposed by the Carter plan, it would be an efficient and beneficial reduction. The market will forgo $13 imported oil only when coal substitution energy, or conservation energy, or new domestic oil and gas reserves are available at a lower cost. The market will not choose $18 conservation energy, $20 coal conversion or $24 synthetic crude over $13 imported oil. And it shouldn't. The strength of our economy and our international competitive position can be maintained only if we purchase all our energy supplies at the lowest price available—even if that means turning to the world oil market for a significant portion of our needs.

The mandatory coal conversion program is the heart of the administration's oil import reduction program. It is also the best demonstration of the bad economics of the Carter plan.

Coal is cheaper than $13 oil for operating large new utility and industrial boilers, primarily because of the economies of scale involved in coal transport, handling, storage, combustion and pollution control. Not surprisingly, the market already has recognized that coal is the lowest-cost alternative for large new facilities. Virtually all large boilers ordered in the past two years have been coal-fired.

These large new facilities will use coal without bureaucratic prodding. The real brunt of the Carter coal conversion program would fall on existing facilities and small industrial boilers, neither of which could ever be operated on coal for under $13 per barrel equivalent in fully allocated costs. These facilities would be compelled to use up to $20 per barrel coal "conversion energy" in place of $13 oil. The administration's plan would thus impose energy cost structures far in excess of the prevailing world price on large segments of U.S. industrial production.

The administration isn't the only perpetrator of such bad bargains. Sen. Russell Long's plan to make $16 shale oil competitive via a $3-a-barrel tax credit involves the dubious bargain of spending $16 of national income to save $13.

The truth is that spending $16 or more to save $13 is the essence of the National Energy Plan, Project Independence and all their progeny. Every panacea being pushed in the policy arena today—subsidized acceleration of the fast breeder, federally financed synthetic fuels developments, subsidized solar power installation, more draconian conservation measures such as thermal efficiency standards for existing housing, mandatory industrial efficiency standards, gas guzzler taxes—involves the forced feeding of energy into the economy at costs far above world oil prices.

Washington does not have a great reputation for economic acumen, but the present wholesale stampede to adopt bad economic bargains requires more of an explanation than simply ignorance. The explanation lies in two unsupportable notions that have been incorporated into the conventional wisdom.

The first is that world markets are running out of energy supplies and can't be relied upon much longer—so we must go it alone. The nonsense of this proposition is revealed best by the fact that in the 100-year history of the petroleum age, the world economy has thus far succeeded in consuming only 8 percent of the conservatively estimated resource base of natural gas and 15 percent of oil resources.

Even with today's still imperfect geologic knowledge, using cautious pre-1973 estimates, there are nearly 3,000 trillion barrels of oil and gas left—enough to last the world another half century even at double current rates of consumption. And that is to say nothing of the far more prodigious endowment of lower grade resources—25,000 trillion barrels of coal and geopressurized gas alone—that could be upgraded to refinery and pipeline quality fuels when price and cost levels warrant it.

The second bit of nonsense is that although the raw supplies may be there, the market mechanism itself has disappeared: OPEC is alleged to have suspended or superseded the economic rules of supply and demand, and what may have once been an international energy marketplace has now become a wholly political arena of intrigue, power plays and peril. Were we to abandon the quest for energy independence, the argument goes, U.S.-stimulated growth of world oil demand would encourage OPEC to substantially increase the price again during the 1980s. Given the oil and gas exploration boom underway all over the globe. This scenario seems wholly unconvincing unless bolstered with fudge-factory numbers like those contained in the now discredited CIA study of last April.

But even if there is some slight probability that OPEC will increase the world oil price significantly during the mid-1980s, the argument is irrelevant. One is tempted to ask Secretary Schlesinger why it is so bad to permit OPEC to inflict an $18 energy price regime on the U.S. economy in 1985, but patriotic and virtuous to empower his department to do the same thing in 1978.

In reality, the only result of the administration's high-cost strategy of oil import abstinence would be to keep the world oil price at $13 for a few years or even a decade longer than otherwise, with most of the benefit accruing to Western Europe and Japan.

There are reasonable prospects, however, that the world price of oil will not rise appreciably in real terms over the next decade or so. It is becoming increasingly clear that there may be an effective ceiling on world energy prices in the range of $18 to $24 a barrel for decades to come. At those price levels, the supply of non-OPEC conventional oil and gas and unconventional fuels of every sort is so enormous, and the opportunities for major gains in consumption efficiencies so great, that this ceiling is unlikely to be breached for generations, if ever.

Whether OPEC pushes the price of oil to this economic ceiling in the 1980s by withholding production or allows its output to expand to meet world demand at roughly present real price levels depends almost entirely on whether it wants to make a little or a lot of money from its vast remaining geologic endowment. If it wants to make a lot of money, it will keep the price below the economic ceiling, maximize production and earn an indefinite annual 3 to 4 percent real rate of return on the proceeds by purchasing international assets or investing in domestic economic expansion.

Of course, if Mr. Yamani and his colleagues didn't learn anything at Harvard Business School after all, they may push the oil price up to the ceiling during the next decade, only to find their world markets progressively shrinking in response to a flood of competitive alternatives.

In short, the oil withholding game only works when the world energy market permits oil prices to rise so rapidly that oil in the ground appreciates at a faster real rate than the rate of return available from the proceeds of currently produced oil. That was the unique situation during the first half of this decade.

OPEC leaders are not unmindful that even they have not transcended the rules of the economic game. This was demonstrated at the recent Caracas meeting when they decided to let the real price decline slightly this year rather than incur worsening surpluses.

If OPEC can recognize these things, why can't we? It's time to declare the energy crisis over, finish building the strategic oil reserve to cushion against any short-run contingencies, and abandon our masochistic fling with energy autarky.●

A TRIBUTE TO SENATOR MURIEL BUCK HUMPHREY

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to your attention and that of my colleagues in the House the honor that was recently bestowed upon Senator MURIEL BUCK HUMPHREY by the Atlantic City Models Guild.

Each year, the Atlantic City Models Guild awards a large silver seashell to a woman who has made a significant contribution to a particular field or endeavor, or who is noted for her national, State or community achievements.

Senator HUMPHREY is the 24th recipient of this award. Mrs. Marie McCullough, head of the models guild said that Mrs. HUMPHREY was selected as this year's honoree since she was the first wife of a national nominee of either party to campaign independently for her husband outside of the home State. She opened a new era for women in politics.

Although Senate commitments kept Senator HUMPHREY from accepting this honor in Atlantic City personally, I accepted the silver seashell in her behalf.

I believe that this was a wise choice for Senator MURIEL HUMPHREY is truly a woman for all seasons.●

TRADE TALKS AND THE CHEMICAL INDUSTRY

HON. JOHN M. SLACK

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. SLACK. Mr. Speaker, certainly one of the more difficult economic problems facing policymakers today is the matter of international trade. Without question, the decisions being made now will impact on every American well into the future.

The problem defies simple solution. While the growing interdependence of the world marketplace prevents any industrial nation from total protectionism, it also makes anachronistic the belief of ever achieving "free" trade. For an increasing number of foreign governments are owning, managing, or subsidizing their export-related businesses. Given this precondition, the goal we must now work toward is not the establishment of "free" but "fair" trade.

The Geneva trade talks is a proper forum from which to further this objective. And Williams S. Sneath, chemical industry trade adviser and chairman of the board of Union Carbide Corp. in a recent article published in the New York Times, pointedly demonstrates how these trade negotiations could affect the future viability of America's chemical industry. His arguments merit serious consideration which is why I have chosen to insert the entire article in today's RECORD:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, Apr. 2, 1978]

IN TRADE TALKS, A CHEMICAL REACTION

(By William S. Sneath)

We in the chemical industry are deeply concerned about the direction of the Tokyo round of multilateral trade negotiations now going forward in Geneva. And we are having trouble conveying this concern to the United States officials involved.

We understand the difficulties of the negotiators as they seek to reduce the protectionist tendencies prevalent in the world today, and we share their belief that the Tokyo round negotiations must be concluded with "meaningful success." But we are apprehensive that this "success" may come unnecessarily at the expense of American industry and American workers, including our own. And we are worried that the accelerated schedule of the negotiations will not allow sufficient time to deal with the important economic changes that have occurred since the articles of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, under whose auspices the meetings are taking place, were written three decades ago.

We therefore ask the negotiators to consider the long-term, as well as the short-term, effects of their decisions. And we urge them to consider a detailed review and modernization of GATT, including the possibility of creating a new, more up-to-date GATT-like organization.

How can an industry with a current trade surplus of $5 billion and with technology and plants as modern as any in the world possibly be concerned about the current trade negotiations? Because the agreements reached will take effect in the future—and the future is precisely when the United States chemical industry will face its greatest competitive challenge.

The American chemical industry has competed successfully overseas for decades. We as an industry do not believe in protecting inefficiency, and we look forward in continuing competition in the international arena—as long as everyone is playing by the same rules. But today not everyone is playing by the same rules, and, more importantly, the rules themselves are outdated. The changes have been seen on both the domestic and international fronts.

Greater Government regulation is evident. For example, the United States Toxic Substances Control Act will decrease the number of new products introduced to the market, and will cause a multiyear lag for those that make it. Testing will be extremely costly. And the chemical industry could well lose some of its best performing products in both the domestic and export markets. Workplace safety regulations under the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA) are also adding to the chemical industry's competitive burdens—as are air and water pollution-abatement and solid-waste-disposal regulations.

While the chemical industry recognizes and supports the need for quality-of-life goals, American producers are facing these added costs earlier than most of our foreign competitors.

We also face governmental action on the energy front that, in all probability, will increase United States crude oil costs about 30 percent and raise natural gas prices substantially. The chemical industry supports this movement toward world prices as being in the overall national interest. Nevertheless, the resulting jump in product costs will affect our industry's competitive position at home as well as abroad.

These added cost factors might normally be recovered through increased prices, but that will be difficult in the 1980's, for there has been a fundamental worldwide change in the structure of the chemical industry, with foreign governments increasingly entering the business—either through direct ownership or by exercising control over them.

Studies by the Office of the Chemical Industry Trade Adviser show that such government-owned or -controlled enterprises constitute a major and growing competitive threat in a host of large-volume chemical markets. These government-owned or -controlled companies are most often guided by political and public-policy considerations, such as employment and foreign-exchange earnings criteria, rather than by classical free-market supply-demand relationships. And this has contributed to a growing worldwide overcapacity some important chemicals and to the further erosion of the United States share of chemical export markets.

It is not intended here to argue the merits of the private-enterprise market system; it is within the purview of each nation to determine its own economic system and procedures. What is of concern is the impact these different systems have on international trading patterns.

For the current round of trade negotiations Washington has as its overall goal a reduction of approximately 40 percent in United States import duties. We are concerned that negotiators may attempt to reach that overall goal by sharply reducing tariffs in currently healthy domestic industries, such as chemicals.

Adding deep tariff cuts to the increasing competitive challenges could unnecessarily penalize the future of the chemical industry. Our industry and other viable American industries and their workers must not be offered as sacrificial lambs.

We do not believe there is sufficient time under the accelerated schedule of the Geneva negotiations to deal with the important changes that have occurred since the GATT articles were written three decades ago. In 1947, for example, there were about 70 sovereign nation states. Today there are 150.

One modification we would recommend is that the GATT should encompass all the trading nations—including the developing nations for which international trade is becoming more important. The present GATT has only 69 members.

The present GATT framework for international trade is based on the premise that international trade will generally result in the most efficient allocation of economic resources—if resources are allowed to flow according to market forces. But the market system continues to predominate in relatively few nations. We propose that the GATT be restructured to take into account the "managed" economies, "mixed" economies and state-operated economies.

For example, the new GATT should contain a stronger mechanism to identify and measure government subsidization of industries that are involved in international trade. In some "managed" or state-operated economies, it is becoming more difficult to find or to prove hidden subsidization in the classic sense as originally envisioned by GATT.

Similarly, present antidumping rules are difficult to enforce on products exported by state-controlled industries. This problem will become worse because it will become increasingly difficult to establish "free market value" of the products in the country of origin on which to gauge the dumping.

Therefore, we urge the Geneva negotiators to agree to begin a detailed review and modernization of GATT, or as a separate exercise following the conclusion of the Tokyo round, to create a new GATT-like organization—one that would be more responsive to world economic conditions as they exist today.

William S. Sneath, chairman of the Union Carbide Corporation, is the chemical industry trade adviser.●

THE GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY OF THE EXCHANGE CLUB OF FARMINGTON, CONN.

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1978, the Exchange Club of Farmington, Conn., will be celebrating its Golden Anniversary. From its modest beginnings in 1928, the club has grown to over one hundred business and professional men joined in the common purpose of service to the community.

The National Exchange Club is the oldest and largest civic organization in the United States. The Farmington chapter—although located in a relatively small community—is the largest Exchange Club in Connecticut, and one of the largest nationally. Its programs of service include the "Youth of the Month" program, and sponsorship of the Farmington Boy Scout Troop No. 68 and the Connecticut Junior Miss Pageant, as well as many other community-oriented programs.

On April 14, 1978, the club will be commemorating its 50th birthday with a dinner-dance at the Golf Club of Avon, Avon, Conn. Mr. Robert C. Garland, president of the National Exchange Club, will make the keynote address.

The greatest tribute to the dedication of this fine organization can be found in the words of its National "Covenant of Service":

COVENANT OF SERVICE

(Adopted as the philosophy which characterizes an Exchangite)

Accepting the divine privilege of single and collective responsibility as life's noblest gift, I covenant with my fellow Exchangites:

To consecrate my best energies to the uplifting of Social, Religious, Political and Business ideals;

To discharge the debt I owe to those of high and low estate who have served and sacrificed that the heritage of American citizenship might be mine;

To honor and respect law, to serve my fellowmen, and to uphold the ideals and institutions of my Country;

To implant the life-giving, society-building spirit of Service and Comradeship in my social and business relationships;

To serve in Unity with those seeking better conditions, better understandings, and greater opportunities for all.

I congratulate this group on an outstanding 50 years of service, and know that the Exchange Club of Farmington will continue to work in an exemplary fashion for the community.●

A MESSAGE TO SHAREHOLDERS

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, the millions of men, women, and young people who own shares in American corporations and businesses are the real stockholders in America.

These are the people whose investments make possible the productivity and growth of our private enterprise economy. Without them, and the millions of employees who pay taxes to support our governments at various levels, this country would not enjoy the degree of public service we receive from Government.

Many people understandably believe that Government has grown too big, has taken on too many responsibilities that could be better handled by others, and therefore takes too much in taxes from the people.

A thoughtful explanation of this trend toward bigger and bigger Government, including bureaucratic control and regimentation, as it relates to our productive enterprise system, is made each year by Greyhound Corp., Board Chairman, Gerald H. Trautman, in his annual stockholders' report.

In this year's message to the owners of Greyhound, Mr. Trautman talks about unfair double taxation of dividends, employment, myths about profits, and Government overregulation.

I believe this is an excellent analysis of some of the problems posed by big Government that face the shareholders of America, and would like to include Mr. Trautman's message at this point in the RECORD:

IN THE CHAIRMAN'S VIEW

(There is a new awareness within corporate America of the need to assume a wider perception of its place in the scheme of things. This includes commenting on issues that impinge on the environment in which business must operate and shareholders invest. Greyhound Chairman Gerald H. Trautman initiated a number of forums in 1977 to touch on issues of broad concern, including a series of dividend messages reprinted below:)

DOUBLE TAXATION OF DIVIDENDS DISCOURAGES INVESTORS

In 1976, The Greyhound Corporation paid to its shareowners in the form of dividends over 62% of its 1976 net income. This dividend payout is substantially higher than the average payout for Dow Jones stocks (43%) or for the Standard & Poor's 500 companies (41%).

While our dividend payout is exceptional, there is a problem that Greyhound shareowners face in common with America's 25 million other shareowners. It is the unfair double taxation of corporate earnings, once at corporate level and again at the shareowner level.

Before any distribution of earnings was made to our shareowners, the Greyhound Corporation paid the taxes due on that income. Yet, following the distribution of those profits, they were taxed again . . . this time to you . . . as personal income.

This double tax on equity earnings is not only unfair to shareowners, but has the effect of discouraging the owning and holding of stock by private investors. In recent years, the number of U.S. shareowners has slid from 32 million to the present 25 million. Fewer individual investors participating in the market means that industry will have an increasingly difficult task raising the estimated $4.5 trillion it will need in new capital over the next decade to keep the economy moving. Of more immediate concern to shareowners, however, is the fact that the fewer individual investors in the market, the less bidding occurs . . . the kind of competitive bidding that results in a more realistic valuation placed on a company's stock.

At Greyhound, we strongly support legislation which would end this double taxation of corporate earnings. This would mean a substantially increased return on investment to our shareowners, and consequently make equity investing more attractive to the individual investor.

RISE IN EMPLOYMENT IS VITAL ECONOMIC SIGN

In recent weeks, there has been renewed concern over the unemployment rate, which rose in August to 7.1%. The trouble with the hue and the cry, however, is twofold:

First, unemployment statistics historically capture the public's attention, but gains in employment numbers go largely unnoticed, and

Second, attention is riveted on a single unemployment statistic of 7.1%, while unemployment facts of far greater consequence are buried.

By way of explanation, let's examine the past five years. In that period, the number of U.S. jobs has risen by over 10 million. In August, there were 91 million Americans employed in civilian jobs, compared with a little over 80 million in 1972. With very little notice and even less fanfare, the nation's army of jobholders has risen to 91 million for the first time in history.

Of course, unemployment has risen too. In 1972, some five million people were unemployed, or 6%. In August 1977, some seven million people were out of work. But were it not for those 10 million new jobs that were created in the intervening five years, the unemployment rate today would be up around 9%. In short, in just five years, an expanding, growing U.S. economy absorbed 10 million new workers into the labor force, and business and industry . . . the private sector . . . were responsible for most of those employment gains.

No one would seriously advance the concept that an unemployment rate of 7.1% is "ideal" not cause for jubilation. But it must be pointed out that in following the state of America's economic health, the trend of employment is just as significant a "vital sign" as is the trend of unemployment!

The other danger inherent in limiting one's vision to a consideration of a single unemployment statistic is the fact that that statistic masks other, more arresting unemployment facts of life . . . such as a 34% unemployment rate among young black males and a staggering 41% unemployment rate among black teens.

It is statistics such as these, rather than a limited preoccupation with a single unemployment figure, that are cause for alarm and concern.

And however much the government economists and the Congressional lawmakers may publicly bemoan unemployment and seek short-term band-aid solutions to the problem, the only solution lies in encouraging, not hamstringing, the growth of business and industry.

The only real source of jobs in this country is private industry, where jobs are created and supported not by tax dollars, but by the production of goods and services.

PUBLIC MISLED ON SIZE OF CORPORATE PROFITS

The American public, polled on the subject of profits, believes that approximately 26¢ out of every dollar of revenue winds up in the corporate cash register as profit.

That the average profit of American business is actually less than 3¢ on every dollar eludes most people. And why not? When financial page headlines read, "XYZ Corp. Reports 50% Jump in Profits" the public can hardly be blamed for believing that XYZ Corp. has, by some extortionate means, made itself rich beyond its dreams of avarice.

What eludes the reader is the fact that the heading refers not to profit, but simply to a rate of change in current year earnings compared to the prior year.

In short, if a company made 2¢ profit on sales last year, and this year makes 3¢, it has had an earnings increase of 50% . . . but that hardly translates into an embarrassment of riches!

Last year, in a special annual report to employees, I used the simple device of explaining profits by premising that each of Greyhound's 52,000 employees divided up the total business and ran his or her segment as a proprietorship.

On that basis, in 1976, the employee earned revenues of $72,308. Out of that, he paid $23,640 to farmers for livestock and poultry, $28,752 for operating costs and expenses, and $15,479 to himself for wages, health and pension benefits.

Interest amounting to $696 was paid on the money he borrowed to finance his company's growth, and there was $2,258 allocated to pay taxes to local, state and federal governments.

At year-end, the employee closed his books and found he had made a net profit of $1,483, but even this was not really "bottom line." From net income he paid $916 as dividends to the people who lent him the money to get started. That left him with $567 of retained income to reinvest in his one-man business to expand, grow and compete in his industry . . . $567 . . . roughly 1¢ out of the revenue dollar he started with.

That's a far cry from the image of corporate "bounty" popularly held by the American public, and the time is long overdue for public perception of profit to start to square up with corporate reality!

THE CONSUMER PAYS FOR OVER-REGULATION

Over 150 years ago, a Justice of the Supreme Court pointed out that the power to tax carries with it the power to destroy. In our century, this observation more accurately applies to the power to regulate!

As I have so often pointed out in our shareholder communications, over-regulation and unnecessary regulation put an intolerable burden on business and industry, and consequently on all shareholders as well.

Literally thousands of regulatory bodies, agencies and commissions exist today whose operation amounts to nothing more or less than self-enshrinement. Possessing the power to enact regulatory legislation, police it, enforce it and then pronounce judgement for violation, these agencies are answering to no one. It has been variously estimated that complying with the mandates of regulatory agencies costs the American consumer over $130 billion a year. No one questions the wisdom or the necessity of prudent regulation, thoughtfully and responsibly administered. But unnecessary regulation brings in its wake padlocked businesses, lost jobs, reduced earnings and dividends, increased unemployment taxes, and the ultimate irony of dubious benefits . . . or none at all.

The new Administration appears to be making a serious effort to whittle down the towering edifice of bureaucracy that has been erected in Washington, and relieve the staggering burden on taxpayers to support that bureaucracy. I would urge you, as shareholders and as consumers, to support these efforts.

Regulation for its own sake . . . hastily conceived and haphazardly administered . . . neither restrains nor reforms. It merely cripples the productive capacity of the nation and the economic well-being of its people.●

FORSAKING CONSTITUTION TO BOOST SAGGING PRESIDENCY

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, the Senate action rejecting the need for a House vote on any transfer of property in the Panama Canal Zone is unconstitutional, destructive of the legislative partnership, and an imperious attitude reminiscent of a House of Lords.

As a leading advocate in Congress for the need for House involvement in property transfer provisions and appropriations involved in the Panama Canal treaties, I can say the Senate action was not unexpected but it is always disappointing to see political expedience warping the constitutional process.

Article IV of the Constitution clearly states that the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Article I stipulates that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

The Constitution has checks and balances and depends upon the partnership process between legislative bodies and between the various divisions and strata of government. The advocacy by this administration of the concept of self-executing treaties to the exclusion of other powers and restrictions of the Constitution creates the dangerous precedent of a lawmaking process excluding the House of Representatives, the people's voice.

This will not be tolerated by Members of the House who consider themselves constitutional coequals of the Senate and 237 Members of Congress reject this high-handedness by the administration and Senate leadership as cosponsors of my resolution No. 347 to prevent any transfer of property in the Panama Canal Zone without an act of Congress, which includes both Houses.

The gauntlet has apparently been thrown down by a Senate politically bent more toward preserving a sagging Presidency than with upholding the Constitution. But the challenge will be met in legislative activities by the House of Representatives pending in committee and through the route of a discharge petition or in the courts before the Panama Canal issue is finally resolved.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to note that the Senate was adequately and timely informed of the House attitude on the Panama Treaty controversy. For the RECORD, just prior to the critical vote on the Hatch amendment designed to assure adherence to provisions of the Constitution under article IV in any approval of the proposed Panama Canal treaties, I sent the following letter on March 31, 1978, to all Members of the U.S. Senate which contained information vital to their consideration:

DEAR SENATOR: A critical issue has surfaced regarding the proposed Panama Canal Treaty which must be dealt with effectively to protect the Constitutional processes of this government and preserve the balance of powers concept.

I am writing to you as a representative of the majority of the Members of the House of Representatives. We believe that it is unconstitutional and inappropriate for the multi-billion dollar investment of the United States in the Canal Zone to be transferred to the Republic of Panama by treaty alone. Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution gives to the Congress the exclusive power to dispose of U.S. property and territory. Failure to exercise that power in this crucial question of the Canal Zone will be a disastrous precedent for the separation of powers in our government.

Over 235 Members of the House have gone on record in support of a House vote on the disposition of property in the Panama Canal Zone, a clear majority of the Members of this body. This is a Constitutional issue and not one of partisan politics. A recent national poll (Feb. 24–27, 1978) conducted by Opinion Research Corporation of Princeton, New Jersey, found that 70 percent of Americans favor the House of Representatives voting on the disposition of property in the Panama Canal Zone. Only 17 percent said no. It is our duty as the elected representatives of the people to assure that their voice is heard.

We do not address ourselves to the matter of Treaty approval which clearly is a responsibility of the Senate under Article 2, Section 2, Clause 2. However, we are deeply concerned that constitutional authority and traditional principles under other Sections not be abridged by any sweeping exercise of Treaty approval prerogatives.

Specifically, Article 4, Section 3, Clause 2 bestows on Congress, not just the Senate, "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Also, Article I, Section 9, Clause 7 states, "No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law," which requires, of course, action by the House as well as the Senate.

There is no need to point out the mischief which might take place if the concept of "self-executing" treaties is allowed to prevail where property disposal and appropriations are involved. Once the precedent exists, where will the lines be drawn? Will Treaty approval power further expand to preclude any need for action by the House of Representatives in matters of foreign policy? If the possibilities are expended, will self-executing treaties even allow tax adjustments and other appropriations-type authority exclusive of House action?

The Separation of Powers doctrine is in grave danger and the traditional partnership processes of our two co-equal legislative bodies is jeopardized by the self-executing treaty concept.

Previous to this Administration all substantial legal opinion and precedent support the partnership constitutional process in treaty approval where the appropriate clauses are applied in tandem as necessary. This is particularly true in the case of treaties with Panama where this procedure has been followed scrupulously.

Since the President has strongly insisted on an unprecedented carte-blanche application of the self-executing treaty concept which creates the dangerous precedent of a lawmaking process excluding the House of Representaives, the people's voice, much concern has arisen and been publicly manifested by a majority of the Members of the House.

One striking illustration of this concern for preservation of constitutional balance and the rights and responsibilities of the House is the 235 co-sponsors on H. Con. Res. 347 which insists that no transfer of rights or property can be made in the Panama Canal Zone without an Act of Congress.

Well over 100 members of each political party are co-signers and both pro-treaty and anti-treaty people are included, all of whom see an issue at stake separate from and of even greater concern than the proposed transfer of the Panama Canal. It is so critical that many members are co-sponsors who normally would not become involved such as Committee Chairman and other members of party leadership on both sides.

Having 235 co-sponsors on a Resolution dealing with a highly controversial issue is most unusual if not unprecedented, especially when it is known that dozens more support the principle who have not officially become sponsors. Twenty-eight of the 44 Chairmen and Ranking Minority Members of the standing committees of the House are co-sponsors.

Previously many Senators have publicly expressed their support of this Constitutional issue, many as recently as the 94th Congress.

I would like to call your attention to the sponsorship of Senate Resolution 97 introduced in the 94th Congress. The following is quoted from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 4, 1975, S 507D.

Senate Resolution 97: Submission of a Resolution urging retention of undiluted U.S. sovereignty over the Canal Zone.

The resolution submitted by Mr. Thurmond (for himself, Mr. McClellan, Mr. Robert C. Byrd, Mr. Long, Mr. Eastland, Mr. Randolph, Mr. Talmadge, Mr. Symington, Mr. Hartke, Mr. McIntyre, Mr. Tower, Mr. Fong, Mr. Curtis, Mr. Fannin, Mr. Hruska, Mr. Hansen, Mr. Goldwater, Mr. Hollings, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Nunn, Mr. Allen, Mr. Beall, Mr. Domenici, Mr. William L. Scott, Mr. Young, Mr. Stone, Mr. Montoya, Mr. Ford, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Helms, Mr. Buckley, Mr. McClure, Mr. Garn, Mr. Laxalt, Mr. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., Mr. Dole, and Mr. Bartlett) is as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States of America that—

(1) the Government of the United States should maintain and protect its sovereign rights and jurisdiction over the canal and zone, and should in no way cede, dilute, forfeit, negotiate, or transfer any of these sovereign rights, power, authority, jurisdiction, territory, or property that are indispensably necessary for the protection and security of the United States and the entire Western Hemisphere; and

(2) there be no relinquishment or surrender of any presently vested United States sovereign right, power, or authority or property, tangible or intangible, except by treaty authorized by the Congress and duly ratified by the United States; and

(3) there be no recession to Panama, or other divestiture of any United States-owned property, tangible or intangible, without prior authorization by the Congress (House and Senate) as provided in Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the United States Constitution.

This is in keeping with previous precedent concerning disposal of property in and around the Panama Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama.

The United States has transferred territory and property in and around the Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama on four previous occasions.

The 1932 and 1937 transfers were effected by Act of Congress. In 1943, a Joint Resolution approved an executive agreement calling for the transfer of property to Panama. Three provisions in a 1955 treaty with Panama provided for the disposition of territory and property. One of those provisions required implementing legislation. Although the other two provisions did not call for implementing legislation, a State Department official acknowledged that implementing legislation would be required for all three provisions.

The Library of Congress concluded in a study of this Constitutional question that "Congress has often asserted an exclusive right to dispose of federal territory and property. It is also apparent that both the Executive and the Senate have recognized that claim in past dispositions of property in the Canal Zone to Panama. Therefore, while it is impossible to make a categorical assertion that Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 is either exclusive or concurrent, it appears that those powers have been recognized as exclusive for purposes of disposal of property in and around the Canal Zone to Panama."

Even the Mexican Prisoner Exchange Treaty of 1977 approved by the current Senate was predicated on an implementing act of Congress before it would become effective. The Congressional Record of July 21, 1977, page S 2553 shows that the declaration to the resolution of ratification was agreed to as follows: That the United States Government declares that it will not deposit its instrument of ratification until after the implementing legislation referred to in Article IV has been enacted. This declaration passed the Senate by a vote of 90–0.

Finally it should be remembered that the House will act on any Panama Treaty approval implementation—this is even conceded by the Administration. The question is will we act in constitutional partnership so nothing is formulated that is not supported by timely action of both Houses of Congress or will we only be taken in as a junior partner after implementation has begun and conditions are set where the choice lies between rubber stamping what has already been decided or working our will at the risk of breaking promises and creating an international incident.

I feel that to exclude the House on this very critical issue in light of previous precedent would be disastrous and passage of the implementing legislation by the House would be in jeopardy. Additionally I am sure such exclusion would invite many Constitutional cases to be filed with the Courts, perhaps even by the entire House.

There are two distinct issues of concern, one is the proposed transfer of the Panama Canal, the other is the preservation of Constitutional balance and traditional legal procedure especially as it involves the authority and power of the House of Representatives. We ask that, whatever your feelings regarding the Panama Treaty issue, you join us in fighting for the rights of the House and preservation of our proper constitutional role as Representatives of the people.

We earnestly solicit your support of a proper stipulation to assure this condition, such as Senator Hatch's proposed Amendment 92 which at the end of Article I of the proposed treaty adds the following new section:

No. 5. It is expressly provided that this treaty shall, in no event, enter into force until the Congress of the United States in accordance with the provisions of Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States of America, shall have disposed of, or shall have authorized the disposition of, the property belonging to the United States of America, or of any of its agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, as it existed on September 7, 1977.

To more clearly place the issues of disposal, appropriations, and implementation squarely before the Congress I have introduced on March 16, 1978, H.R. 11634, the draft proposal for treaty implementation as submitted by the Administration which has been referred jointly to Committees on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

H.R. 11634 is entitled, "A bill to provide the congressional authorization required by clause 2, section 3, article IV of the Constitution, for the transfer to Panama of the property of the United States in the Canal Zone; to authorize the appropriations required by clause 7, section 9, article I of the Constitution, to implement that transfer of United States property, including the transfer of military installations and of cemeteries in which United States veterans are interred, the closing of the Canal Zone courts, and the assumption by the United States Postal Service of the functions of the Canal Zone postal service; to otherwise provide legislatively the authorizations not provided pursuant to clause 2, section 2, article II of the Constitution which are necessary to implement the Panama Canal Treaty of 1977 and related agreements; and for other purposes."

The constitutional course is clear and the will of the House is well-known. We trust you will support us in your consideration of Amendment 92 by Senator Hatch currently scheduled for action or a similar provision continuing the Constitutional balance enjoyed by our two legislative bodies for nearly 200 years.

Sincerely,

GEORGE HANSEN,
Member of Congress.

Also sent to the majority leader of the Senate on April 4, 1978, with copies to all Members was the following letter:

Hon. ROBERT C. BYRD,
Majority Leader, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BYRD: Just three years ago in the 94th Congress on March 4, 1975 you and 36 other Senators[1] sponsored S. Res. 97 which concluded with the following:

"(3) there be no recession to Panama, or other divestiture of any United States-owned property, tangible or intangible, without prior authorization by the Congress (House and Senate), as provided in article IV, section 3, clause 2, of the United States Constitution."

A majority of the Members of the House in this Congress have sponsored H. Con. Res. 347 which now has 235 cosigners[2] and similarly states:

"That any right to, title to, or interest in the property of the United States government agencies in the Panama Canal Zone or any real property and improvements thereon located in the zone should not be conveyed, relinquished, or otherwise disposed of to any foreign government without specific authorization of such conveyance, relinquishment, or other disposition by an Act of Congress."

On July 21, 1977 the 95th Senate which is still in session again invoked the balance of powers qualification when it approved 90–0 the Mexican Prisoner Exchange Treaty with the reservation:

"That the United States Government declares that it will not deposit its instrument of ratification until after the implementing legislation referred to in article IV has been enacted."

This constitutional partnership linking Senate treaty powers under article II, section 2, clause 2 with the authority of the full Congress under article IV, section 3, clause 2 (property disposal) and article I, section 9, clause 7 (appropriations) has been traditional and especially so in the case of all Panama treaties.

Therefore, we in the House trust the Senate will support the Hatch Amendment this week or a like provision in consideration of the Panama Canal Treaty. This Amendment 92 adds to the end of article I of the proposed treaty the following new section:

"(5) It is expressly provided that this treaty shall, in no event, enter into force until the Congress of the United States in accordance with the provisions of article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States of America, shall have disposed of, or shall have authorized the disposition of, the property belonging to the United States of America, or of any of its agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, as it existed on September 7, 1977.".

History is clear, precedent is traditional, an overall majority of those is committee leadership of this 95th Congress (House and Senate combined) are on record for timely congressional action before any treaty implementation where property disposal or appropriations are necessitated.

Sincerely,

GEORGE HANSEN,
Member of Congress.●

TWO HUNDRED YEARS OF ARMY ENGINEERS

HON. J. KENNETH ROBINSON

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, on June 9, 1778. Gen. George Washington posted a general order at Valley Forge, Pa.

By this order, General Washington, in effect, established professional education in engineering in this country. On June 9, 1978, the Freedoms Foundation at Valley Forge, Pa., in association with the National Society of Professional Engineers, will present a 200th anniversary commemorative program at Valley Forge.

One of the Nation's most distinguished soldiers, Gen. Bruce C. Clarke, U.S. Army (retired), who resides at Palmyra, Va., has had an active role in the planning and promotion of this program, in which prominent figures in military and civil engineering will participate.

Gov. John N. Dalton of Virginia has commended this observance to general public notice, as follows:

ENGINEERS 1978 NATIONAL CELEBRATION

On January 28, 1778, General Washington recommended to the Congress that an Engineer Department be formed for the Army, which was accomplished by resolution of Congress on May 27 of that year.

Washington followed this action by calling for volunteers from his men with the necessary qualifications to be educated as engineers to fill the three companies of Engineers. This order of 9 June 1778 was the first call for formal engineering education in America.

The call began a chain of events leading to the establishment of the United States Military Academy at West Point, of which General Thomas Jonathan (Stonewall) Jackson, and General Robert E. Lee were later graduates, and where Lee served as Superintendent from 1852 until 1855.

In 1918, The Army Engineer School was moved to what is now Fort Belvoir, Virginia, which includes Belvoir Manor, the home of Lord Fairfax, to whom young Washington was apprenticed to learn surveying and engineering.

I, therefore, join the engineers of the United States Army and the National Society of Professional Engineers in calling to the attention of all Virginians to the anniversary of Washington's call for engineering education at Valley Forge, June 9, 1778, and the events that followed.

As of further interest, I include the text of a paper presented by Lawrence P. Grayson of the National Institute of Education, Washington, D.C., on December 5, 1977, as follows:

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S ORDER OF JUNE 9, 1778 AND THE ORIGINS OF ENGINEERING EDUCATION

Prior to the time of America's declared independence, there was little need for a school of engineering in the colonies. The military requirements that existed, such as those during the French and Indian War, were met by engineers educated in England who served in the British army or by colonists who served under them. The engineering needs of a civilian nature, which were reflective primarily of hand-craft technology, were met largely by ingenious or industrious men who were self-educated. With the beginning of war, however, America's requirement for qualified engineers became critical.

Shortly after assuming command of the continental forces on June 15, 1775, George Washington advised Congress that the army labored under numerous disadvantages, including "a Want of Engineers to construct proper Works and direct the Men". He continued "I can hardly express the Disappointment I have experienced on this Subject; the skill of those we have being very imperfect." Washington's concern, which he voiced on numerous occasions over the next few years, was shared by many other colonial leaders, including John Adams and Henry Knox.

The lack of a sufficient number of engineers in the army persisted throughout the Revolutionary War, and almost all of those who served as engineering officers were of foreign birth and education. It was recognized that most of these men would return to their native countries when the war ended. America required engineers, not only for the immediate military needs, but also to meet the future requirements of a civilian population when the nation would be independent and developing. These were the conditions and sentiments of the times when the army established winter quarters at Valley Forge, on December 20, 1777.

Shortly after encamping, Brigadier General Louis Duportail, a French volunteer who was serving as chief of engineers, drew up a plan for the establishment of an engineering corps as a permanent part of the Continental army. His plan dated January 18, 1778, called for the formation of enlisted men into companies of sappers headed by officers, and proposed that the companies might serve as a school of apprenticeship for the men. On January 28, Washington endorsed Duportail's plan and recommended to Congress that an engineering department be organized. This was done by a Resolution of Congress on May 27, 1778, as part of a general organization plan for the army. The engineering department was established with three companies, each to contain 1 captain, 3 lieutenants and 68 enlisted men, with the requirement that "These companies to be instructed in the fabrication of field works . . . The commissioned officers to the skilled in the necessary branches of mathematicks".

Washington readily complied with the resolution, stating in the General Orders issued at Valley Forge on June 9 that:

"Three Captains and nine Lieutenants are wanted to officer the Companies of Sappers: As this Corps will be a school of Engineering it opens a Prospect to such Gentlemen as enter it and will pursue the necessary studies with diligence, of becoming Engineers and rising to the Important Employments attached to that Profession as the direction of Fortified Places & C. The Qualifications required of the Candidates are that they be Natives and have a knowledge of the Mathematicks and drawing, or at least be disposed to apply themselves to those studies. They will give in their Names at Head-Quarters."

The need and sentiment for educating engineers in the United States was clearly present at this time, although almost a quarter of a century would pass before a formal school of engineering would be established. In the winter of 1778, General Knox, while camped at Pluckemin, N.J., established "an academy where lectures are read in tactics and gunnery". For the decade following the end of the war in 1783, numerous people, including Washington, Hamilton, Randolph, Knox, Duportail, Baron von Steuben, L'Enfant, Benjamin Lincoln and Timothy Pickering, both of whom served as Secretary of War, and numerous others, stressed the need for officers trained in engineering and the need to establish a military academy. George Washington, in his Presidential message of October 25, 1791, advocated and establishment of a military academy, which actually commenced at West Point in 1794. The academy, in which much of the instruction was devoted to fortifications, continued until April 1796, when a fire destroyed the barracks. On March 16, 1802, an Act of Congress stationed the Corps of Engineers at West Point to constitute the Military Academy, which has continued to the present day. The engineers and cadets at the Academy were made available for such duty and service as the President of the United States might direct, thus allowing them to perform works of a public as well as a military nature. This availability was in keeping with the sentiment expressed in 1800 by James McHenry, the Secretary of War, that "We must not conclude that service of the engineer is limtied to constructing fortifications. This is but a single branch of the profession; their utility extends to almost every department of war; besides embracing whatever respects public buildings, roads, bridges, canals and all such works of a civil nature".

The Military Academy as originally established was loosely organized, operated on meager resources, and had no definite or consistent system of instruction, examination or length of study. It was only as a result of the appointment of Sylvanus Thayer at the time a captain in the Corps of Engineers, as Superintendent in 1817 that the academy developed. Following a trip to France to study its educational system, Thayer arranged the cadets into four annual classes, divided the classes into sections requiring weekly reports, developed a scale of marking, attached weights to the subjects in the curriculum necessary for graduation, instituted a system of discipline and an honor code, and set a standard of high achievement. These characteristics have remained with the academy until the present time, and formed the pattern for technical education in America.

On April 29, 1812, a Congressional Act set further provisions for the Military Academy, including establishing the position of "professor of the art of engineering in all its branches". One of the most influential persons to occupy the position was Dennis Hart Mahan, who was appointed in 1832. His pioneering efforts in the preparation of textbooks on engineering subjects did much to break this country's dependence on the translation and republication of European works.

Alden Partridge, who was the first person to hold the title of professor of engineering in the United States and served as acting Superintendent at West Point, resigned from the army in 1818 and established the American Literary, Scientific and Military Academy at Norwich, Vermont. This institution, which later became Norwich University, was the first civilian school of engineering in the country. In 1824, the Rensselaer School was established and eleven years later granted the degree of civil engineer for the first time in America and Great Britain.

From these initial acts, engineering education in the United States has grown until today are are almost 295,000 graduate and undergraduate students studying engineering on a full-time basis, and an additional 47,000 students studying part-time, at 289 institutions of engineering. In addition, there are some 58,000 full-time students and almost 20,000 students studying part-time at 119 institutions that offer programs in engineering technology.

As a single event, George Washington's call for a school of engineering is but a minor footnote in history. Taken, however, in a larger context as part of a continuing series of events, it is an act by the Commanding General of the Continental Army and future first President of the United States, recognizing the importance of engineering education to meet the needs of an independent and sovereign nation. The celebration of the 200th anniversary of the call, scheduled for June 9, 1978, at Valley Forge, will be formal testimony by the engineering profession to the foresight of George Washington and a reaffirmation of the continuing importance of engineering education to the future of America.●

THOUGHTFUL COMMENTS ON STATE AND FEDERAL TAX RESPONSIBILITIES

HON. RONALD A. SARASIN

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. SARASIN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Frazar B. Wilde, a highly respected Connecticut businessman currently serving as chairman emeritus of the Connecticut General Life Insurance Co., has long been an astute observer of economic conditions and trends in my home State.

In remarks he made recently before a West Hartford, Conn., meeting concerning State tax matters, Mr. Wilde made a number of cogent points regarding tax policy and the future direction of Connecticut's economy.

While the major thrust of the comments deals with local tax questions in Connecticut, and specifically the advantages accruing to our State from the continued absence of a State income tax, much of Mr. Wilde's advice is relevant and should be of interest to many of my colleagues, particularly with regard to his opinions on Federal responsibilities.

Mr. Wilde has been kind enough to make available a summary of his most salient points from his remarks and I would like to make that summary available here for the consideration by my fellow Members of the House:

THE TAX AND FISCAL SITUATION OF CONNECTICUT

In viewing the future progress of the State, we know that taxes, their form and their level will play a major role. We also know that certain elements are basic and timeless. We must recognize that all taxes are negative in their impact and interfere with a successful free society, that there is no such thing as a perfect tax program and that tax decisions come from an amalgam of factors, including those of basic economics interrelated with those of a political nature such as pressure groups.

The following elements I suggest should be an integral part of future decisions involving state taxation:

1. Connecticut should continue to emphasize a conservative budget, one that does not exceed the general cost of living.

2. We must emphasize—and re-emphasize—to our Congressmen and Senators the importance of two national factors, welfare and inflation, on our State's economic future. The federal government should be urged to assume the welfare load. Population movements have imposed a disproportionate share of the burden on the Northeast, especially Connecticut. Inflation, of course, eats at the fiscal strength of all states and the federal government must execute its responsibility for restraining inflation. There is a bill in Congress now to increase aid to state governments for disbursements to cities. It should be stressed to our delegation that Connecticut gets its share from this legislation.

3. When it comes to the form of State taxation, the sales tax stands out at the best of the lot. Advantages include:

It reminds every individual that government service and benefits must be paid for.

It is a proportional tax that requires those who buy more to pay more.

It is easy to adjust up or down as the State's needs vary.

It is difficult to evade.

A progressive income tax would be the most deplorable taxation form of all. It would set in motion further movement toward egalitarianism. Most Connecticut proponents of an income tax advocate what I call a "supertax," not a simple flat tax. A supertax is one that increases disproportionately as income increases and is layered on top of the progressive federal tax. This is a deadend approach that denies incentive. The experience of New Jersey, which recently adopted an income tax, has added to the overwhelming proof that an income tax adds to the total tax and is not a substitute for other state taxes. While our state has a number of challenges to face in encouraging business growth, the absence of a complete state income tax is one advantage we enjoy. Let's not throw it away.●

CBS DOCUMENTARY ON VIETNAM VETS AND AGENT ORANGE TO BE SHOWN HERE

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago, the CBS television affiliate in Chicago aired a documentary which revealed a number of serious illnesses among Vietnam veterans that might have been caused by exposure to a powerful defoliant known as Agent Orange.

Ten million gallons of Agent Orange were sprayed over Vietnam from 1962 to 1970 to defoliate forests. The spraying was halted because of health hazards. But now, more than 10 years later, an apparently growing number of Americans who served in Vietnam have developed illnesses and, in some instances, have had children born with birth defects that may be related to Agent Orange exposure.

The CBS documentary, which was reported by Bill Kurtis, was the first public disclosure of the illnesses affecting Vietnam veterans who were exposed to Agent Orange. The documentary raises important questions concerning not only Government responsibility to these veterans but other health and environmental issues, too.

On Wednesday, April 12, at 1:30 p.m., in the Veteran Affairs Committee room, Cannon 334, CBS anchorman Bill Kurtis will show the documentary that was recently aired and will discuss with Members and staff other aspects of his investigation into this important matter.

Congressman DON EDWARDS and I hope that other Members of Congress and staff will be able to join Mr. Kurtis and us on April 12.●

MURPHY AND RHODES URGE SIGNING OF DISCHARGE PETITION NO. 6

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, the discharge petition is controversial and shunned by many as a bypass of the normal legislative system.

However, it is ironic that as we face a critical constitutional fight over the proposed transfer of the Panama Canal to preserve the rights and responsibilities of the House our best means of saving the system involves bypassing the system.

Although the discharge petition may be overworked by some, it is the only way to overcome the legislative hammerlock that one or a few can impose on the majority under certain circumstances.

This is indeed the case for signing discharge petition No. 6 as outlined by my colleagues JOHN M. MURPHY, chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, and JOHN J. RHODES, House minority leader.

Chairman MURPHY stated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 6, 1978 that—

The action of the Senate . . . in rejecting an amendment to the Panama Canal Treaty that would have recognized the constitutional role of the Congress in disposing of the property of the United States provided in the treaty, should be a matter of profound concern to every Member of the House and of the Senate" because it . . . "flies in the face of the plain provision of article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution and the uniform practice of this Government from the earliest days of the Republic" and because . . . "it represents a radical departure from the theory of the Constitution establishing a balance of power between the three branches of the Government." He emphasized that, "It is especially in derogation of the role of the House of Representatives in the structure of Government in that Senate concurrence in the action of the Executive is substituted for enactment of legislation by the House and the Senate as the Constitution requires.

He points out:

The language of the Constitution is plain and unambiguous in committing to the Congress the authority to dispose of property of the United States . . .

And that—the action of the Senate in arrogating this power to the President and the Senate should not and cannot be accepted by this body.

The chairman states:

The wisdom of the Senate vote in refusing to recognize the legitimate role of the Congress must be questioned when it is recognized that the vote adopts a constitutional interpretation which has been advocated by the Executive and which has historically been opposed by the Congress from the First Congress.

In conclusion he pleads:

It remains of paramount importance that House Members sign discharge petition No. 6 relative to House Concurrent Resolution 347 because the discharge petition is the most expeditious means of bringing the resolution to this floor and allowing all Members to express a position on a matter that vitally affects the powers of which we are trustees.

Minority Leader RHODES in a letter to me dated April 4, 1978, states:

Hon. GEORGE HANSEN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR GEORGE: I have received your letter regarding the need for a discharge petition on H. Con. Res. 347 and strongly agree that if ever there was a time for this unusual procedure to preserve our legislative system and the constitutional provisions for checks and balances, this is it.

Your having the support of affected committee chairmen and ranking minority members in H. Con. Res. 347 and again in the discharge petition is historical and indicative of the need for this effort. I have accordingly extended my support both as a co-sponsor of H. Con. Res. 347 and as a co-signer of discharge petition No. 6 and strongly encourage all Members to do the same.

You are welcome to use this letter as my endorsement of your efforts in this regard.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. RHODES,
Member of Congress, Minority Leader.

Mr. Speaker, I enclose for the record my letter of April 4, 1978, to the minority leader outlining the unusual and overriding need for a discharge petition in this legislation regarding the proposed Panama Canal transfer because of the serious constitutional issues involved:

Hon. JOHN J. RHODES,
House Office Building
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: I am writing regarding the critical issue which we have been addressing for several months regarding the proposed Panama Canal Treaty which must be dealt with effectively to protect the Constitutional processes of this government and preserve the balance of powers concept.

As you know, this does not address itself to the matter of Treaty approval which clearly is a responsibility of the Senate under article 2, section 2, clause 2. But it does involve that concern we share that constitutional authority and traditional principles under other Sections not be abridged by any sweeping exercise of Treaty approval prerogatives.

Specifically, article 4, section 3, clause 2 bestows on Congress, not just the Senate, "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Also, article I, section 9, clause 7 states, "No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law," which requires, of course, action by the House as well as the Senate.

There is no need to point out the mischief which might take place if the concept of "self-executing" treaties is allowed to prevail where property disposal and appropriations are involved. Once the precedent exists, where will the lines be drawn? Will Treaty approval power further expand to preclude any need for action by the House of Representatives in matters of foreign policy? If the possibilities are expanded, will self-executing treaties even allow tax adjustments and other appropriations-type authority exclusive of House action?

The Separation of Powers doctrine is in grave danger and the traditional partnership processes of our two co-equal legislative bodies is jeopardized by the self-executing treaty concept.

Previous to this Administration all substantial legal opinion and precedent support the partnership constitutional process in treaty approval where the appropriate clauses are applied in tandem as necessary. This is particularly true in the case of treaties with Panama where this procedure has been followed scrupulously.

Since the President has strongly insisted on an unprecedented carteblanche application of the self-executing treaty concept which creates the dangerous precedent of a lawmaking process excluding the House of Representatives, the people's voice, much concern has arisen and been publically manifested by a majority of the Members of the House.

One striking illustration of this concern for preservation of constitutional balance and the rights and responsibilities of the House is the 235 co-sponsors on H. Con. Res. 347 which insists that no transfer of rights or property can be made in the Panama Canal Zone without an Act of Congress.

Well over 100 Members of each political party are co-signers and both pro-treaty and anti-treaty people are included, all of whom see an issue at stake separate from and of even greater concern than the proposed transfer of the Panama Canal. It is so critical that many Members are co-sponsors who normally would not become involved such as Committee Chairmen and other members of party leadership on both sides.

Having 235 co-sponsors on a Resolution dealing with a highly controversial issue is most unusual if not unprecedented, especially when it is known that dozens more support the principle who have not officially become sponsors. Twenty-eight of the 44 Chairmen and Ranking Minority Members of the standing committees of the House are co-sponsors.

However, even with this striking illustration of the mood of the House, there appears to be no softening in the Administration and Senate attitude and further action is obviously necessary to impact upon the Executive Branch and legislative leaders coordinating with them that Members of the House will not stand idly by and watch our powers be assumed by other authorities in pursuit of a convenient process for handling a sensitive and controversial issue.

To bring H. Con. Res. 347 to official action, even though 235 co-sponsors signifies passage, the only recourse under the circumstances was the discharge petition route. It is an unusual and difficult process which is often viewed as a shortcut to avoid the regular legislative process or a means to get attention, if not results. Nevertheless, when the will of the House is so thwarted by forces from outside the system, then the discharge petition can serve as the legislative tool it was intended to be.

It is on this basis that leaders such as yourself and Ranking Committee Members, some who have never before signed a discharge petition, have joined in this effort to bring this resolution to a timely vote of the House. This includes Chairmen of Key Committees such as Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Armed Services, and Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This brave and unusual action hopefully will prompt all members to join in this special effort to protect the Constitutional rights of the people and of ourselves as their Representatives.

Even the Mexican Prisoner Exchange Treaty of 1977 approved by the current Senate was predicated on an implementing act of Congress before it would become effective. Why, then would this same Senate be reluctant to condition Panama Treaty approval upon an obviously needed act of Congress when so much property disposal and appropriations of funds are involved? This is why we must assert the mood of the House.

It is inevitable that the House will act on any Panama Treaty approval implementation—this is even conceded by the Administration. The question is will we act in constitutional partnership so nothing is formulated that is not supported by timely action of both Houses of Congress or will we only be taken in as a junior partner after implementation has begun and conditions are set where the choice lies between rubber stamping what has already been decided or working our will at the risk of breaking promises and creating an international incident.

There are two distinct issues of concern, one is the proposed transfer of the Panama Canal, the other is the preservation of Constitutional balance and traditional legal procedure especially as it involves the authority and power of the House of Representatives. I respectfully ask your support in urging that our colleagues in Congress, whatever their feelings regarding the Panama Treaty issue, join us in fighting for the rights of the House and preservation of our proper constitutional role as Representatives of the people by signing discharge petition No. 6.

Sincerely,

GEORGE HANSEN,
Member of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the constitutional question regarding the validity of self-executing treaties in circumstances such as the Panama Canal controversy has spilled over into the courts. Action to uphold the prerogatives of the House was filed by our colleague MICKEY EDWARDS in behalf of 60 Congressmen, including myself.

The U.S. district court in Washington, D.C., dismissed the suit as premature, political and for lack of standing. The Appeals Court has now ruled on the merits of the case making the issue timely, nonpolitical, and recognizing the standing of the plaintiffs. This is a great victory despite the fact that the ruling was 2 to 1 in support of the self-executing treaty.

The matter will now be appealed to the Supreme Court as treaty consideration by the Senate goes down to the wire and as the House makes it move to voice effective opposition to its exclusion from action by unprecedented application of the self-executing treaty.

The case for the House position is extremely strong as evidenced by the caliber of the appeals court justice holding in our favor and the quality of his dissenting opinion. Judge George MacKinnon has a reputation for being that "voice from the judicial wilderness" who has seen his minority position at the appeals court level in classic constitutional cases become the majority opinion in Supreme Court deliberations.

It is thus most important that the House impress well upon the Senate, the administration, and the court, its will to exercise its responsibilities as outlined in the Constitution.

To most effectively signify this determination to maintain constitutional coequality, I strongly urge all Members to sign discharge petition No. 6—do this one for your country.

Self-implementing treaties will create a House of Lords; the House will become hostage to predetermined actions. A $10 billion disposal of U.S. property in Panama requires an act of Congress—both House and Senate—under article IV, section 3, clause 2. A multibillion dollar expenditure of U.S. taxpayer funds requires an act of Congress—both House and Senate—under article I, section 9, clause 7.

House Concurrent Resolution 347 and 237 cosponsors reaffirming that the House must act in the proposed transfer. Discharge petition No. 6 will provide the House the needed early opportunity to reassert itself as a constitutional copartner with the Senate. An overall majority of House and Senate committee chairmen and ranking minority members are on record as supporting this action.

Please sign discharge petition No. 6—now.●

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, 60 years ago, on March 25, 1918, the people of Byelorussia established an independent state dedicated to the democratic principles with which free men are blessed and which all men deserve. For the Byelorussians, no longer enslaved by Soviet control, it was a time of national rebirth. In their declaration of independence they joyously "proclaimed to the entire world that after 3½ centuries of slavery the Byelorussian people are living and will live." It was a statement of ultimate exaltation, reflecting, in spite of injustice and oppression, a successful commitment to long-sought-after ideals of liberty and self-determination.

This hard-won freedom, however, was short-lived. On December 10, 1918, the Red Army seized Minsk, and Byelorussia was again subjugated under Russian control. With the passing of the 60th anniversary of Byelorussian independence, it is our fervent hope that a gallant people will realize once more the inalienable human right of individual and national self-determination. This is a time also in which we honor their courage and continuing loyalty to their heritage, their perseverance in a goal they deem to be worth the suffering. By virtue of their nobility of character, the Byelorussians stand as an example of what mankind is capable both of accomplishing and of enduring, the glory of man, the invincibility of the human heart.●

PRESIDENT NICOLAE CEAUSESCU OF ROMANIA

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 10, 1978

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, on April 12 and 13, 1978, the distinguished President of the Socialist Republic of Romania will pay a state visit to Washington for meetings with the President and Members of Congress. Many issues of longstanding concern to both nations will be discussed. Particular attention will be focused on Romania's critical role in Eastern Europe, the compelling issue of human rights, the extent, and conditions attached to trade between our nations, and the Middle East. It is my hope these discussions will continue the measure of goodwill which exists between us, and that progress can be registered in all these areas.

In recent days, President Ceausescu has renewed his constructive diplomatic efforts with respect to the Middle East, having just held further talks with Israel's foreign minister, Moshe Dayan. Mr. Ceausescu was instrumental in serving as a catalyst in the evolution of the visit of President Sadat to Jerusalem, and in so doing, has rendered an indispensable service in the interests of peace in the area. President Ceausescu's continuing ability to serve as one source of counsel to both parties, and to use his good offices to continue the difficult search for peace, is a mark of his stature as a respected statesman.

I join with my colleagues in welcoming President Ceausescu to the United States.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of the Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of all meetings when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in meeting as they occur.

As an interim procedure until the computerization of this information becomes operational, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committees scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, April 11, 1978, may be found in Daily Digest of today's RECORD.
